

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

LAWYERS' REPORTS,

ANNOTATED.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

BOHN MANUFACTURING CO. et al.,
Appts.,
v.

(.....Neb.....)

* In a contract for the sale of land, it was stipulated that the purchaser should erect a dwelling upon the premises within a stated time. The building was erected, but the labor performed and material furnished were not fully paid for. Held, in an action to foreclose the mechanics' lien, that the liens of the mechanic and materialman have priority over the lien of the vendor for unpaid purchase money.

(November 11, 1890.)

*Head note by NORVAL, J.

NOTE.—Mechanics' liens; priority over subsequent liens.

The lien of a mechanic or materialman begins with the commencement of the work or furnishing of material under his express or implied contract, and attaches upon whatever estate the employer may have at that time. Tritch v. Norton, 10 Colo. 337.

A prior lien is entitled to prior satisfaction out of the thing it binds, unless the lien be intrinsically defective, or is displaced by some act of the party holding it. Rankin v. Scott, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 177, 6 L. ed. 562.

A person who has contracted to sell lands must be deemed the owner for all purposes contemplated by the Statute in regard to the protection of mechanics and others for labor and materials, where the title to the property has not passed. Schmalz v. Mead, 34 N. Y. S. R. 779.

Rule in various States.

California.

A contractor cannot object to the legality of any incumbrance created prior to his lien, by the person with whom, as owner, he contracts. Ferguson v. Miller, 6 Cal. 404.

But those who purchase after the lien attaches take subject to the lien. McGreary v. Osborne, 9 Cal. 121; Crowell v. Gilmore, 13 Cal. 56; Soule v. Dawes, 7 Cal. 578, 14 Cal. 248.

The lien is deemed to have accrued at the time of the commencement of the work or furnishing of the materials. McCrea v. Craig, 23 Cal. 525; Tuttle v. Montford, 7 Cal. 358; Soule v. Dawes, Id. 575; Crowell v. Gilmore, 13 Cal. 54; Germania Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Wagner, 61 Cal. 349. Andee Barbor v. Reynolds, 44 Cal. 520.

To protect a materialman against a prior mortgage, the want of notice must be expressly found. Root v. Bryant, 57 Cal. 48.

A PPEAL by materialmen from a decree of the District Court for Douglas County postponing their liens for materials and labor furnished in erecting a building upon land held under a contract of purchase to the vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. B. G. Burbank and A. C. Troup, for appellants:

In the contract between Kountze and Berlin, Kountze authorized Berlin to contract for the erection of a dwelling-house upon the lot. This is sufficient to subject the interest of Kountze to the liens of the mechanic, materialman and laborer, and entitle them to priority.

Henderson v. Connelly, 11 West. Rep. 729, 123 Ill. 98, 5 Am. St. Rep. 490; Hill v. Gill, 40 Minn. 441; Hilton v. Merrill, 106 Mass. 528; Paulsen v. Manske, 126 Ill. 72; Savoy v. Jones, Colorado.

A mechanics' lien is superior to all after-created liens and any prior liens or incumbrances of which the mechanic or materialman had no actual or constructive notice when he began to work or to furnish materials. Tritch v. Norton, 10 Colo. 337.

Iowa.

A mortgage taken for a valid consideration, more than ninety days after the last item in an account for a mechanics' lien, and before the statement for the lien is filed, is an incumbrance in good faith, without notice, and is superior to the lien. Gilbert v. Tharp, 72 Iowa, 714.

A mortgage on a farm on which a stone dwelling-house is securely built after the mortgage is given and recorded is a first lien on the whole property, and cannot be defeated by a mechanics' lien on the house. Miller v. Seal, 71 Iowa, 302, citing Bank v. Scholth, 59 Iowa, 816, and Curtis v. Broadwell, 68 Iowa, 662.

Where, upon the date of the conveyance of premises in pursuance of the contract therefor, the purchaser executed a mortgage of said premises, which was duly recorded, the mortgagees having no notice of a prior contract for lumber with which to repair, the mortgage takes precedence of the mechanics' lien. Ryder v. Cobb, 68 Iowa, 235.

A materialman furnishing materials to the grantee for the erection of a house upon the land has no mechanics' lien superior to an unrecorded mortgage given prior to the execution of the deed. Moody v. Dryden, 72 Iowa, 461.

Where all the lumber for a building was furnished under one contract, and a statement for a mechanics' lien was filed within ninety days from the furnishing of the last item, a mortgage upon the property, made after that date, was inferior to the mechanics'

An equitable estate or interest in premises is also subject to a mechanic, and the lien follows it into whatsoever hands it may pass. This holds Berlin's interest, and also that of Kountze.

A vendor's lien takes precedence as against lien claimants with actual or constructive notice of lien.

His lien extends only to the interest of the one contracting for the improvement, and a mechanic can occupy no better position than his employer.

lien, though filed before the statement for the lien. Iowa Mortg. Co. v. Shanquest, 70 Iowa, 124.

Illinois.

Where the lien for work and machinery in a mill attached June 30, 1883,—the time of making the contract,—it had priority over a trust deed executed by the defendants July 2, 1883, and recorded July 7, 1883. *Paddock v. #### Kansas.

The provisions of Comp. Laws 1879, art. 27, chap. 80, that the lien of a mechanic shall have preference over all other liens and incumbrances, includes conveyances as to the doctrine of notice. *Warden v. #### Minnesota.

Where, subsequent to the contract for materials to be furnished, the vendee received a deed and executed a purchase-money mortgage, the mortgage was superior to such lien for materials, notwithstanding the failure of vendee to record it until the deed was recorded, the materialman having notice of the execution of the deed, but not of the mortgage. Oliver v. Davy, 84 Minn. 292.

A Statute giving a mechanic's lien precedence over all other incumbrances created before or after such lien is unconstitutional as taking a man's property away without his consent and without process of law. Meyer v. Berliandi, 1 L. R. A. 777, 36 Minn. 433.

Norval, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Bohn Manufacturing Company brought suit in the District Court of Douglas County to foreclose a mechanics' lien upon certain premises in the City of Omaha. Herman Kountze, the owner of the fee, Z. B. Berlin, the equitable owner in possession, under a contract of purchase with Kountze, and various mechanic lienholders were made defendants. Afterwards, Robert G. King was made a party defendant. On the 7th day of September, 1887, the defendant Herman Kountze, being the owner of lot 4, block 15, Kountze place, City of Omaha, contracted in writing to convey, by warranty deed, said lot to the defendant Z. B. Berlin, in case Berlin should perform his part of the contract. The contract price was $2,500; the purchaser paid $100 cash down, and agreed to pay $100 January 7, 1888; $50 September 7, 1888; and $50 on the 1st day of each month thereafter, until the whole sum was paid. All deferred payments were to bear 8 per cent interest from date of sale. The contract contained, among others, this provision: "And it is hereby expressly understood and agreed, and is a part of the consideration for the sale of said lot to Z. B. Berlin, that the said Z. B. Berlin agrees and binds himself, his heirs, executors or assigns, to build, or cause to be built, on said lot a good, substantial new dwelling-house costing not less than $2,500, and, if more than one dwelling is erected on said lot, then each such dwelling shall cost not less than $2,500, exclusive of all the other improvements that may be put on said lot, such house or houses to be built on good, substantial brick or stone foundations. The said dwelling shall be commenced within eight months from the date hereof, and be fully completed within twelve months from the date hereof, time being of the essence of this contract, and the improvements provided for being part of the consideration to be paid for said lot. Therefore, should said Z. B. ments and appurtenances thereunto belonging." Upon the back of the contract was indorsed this memorandum, which was duly signed and witnessed: "It is hereby understood and agreed that, if so requested by the within-named Z. B. Berlin, the within-named H. Kountze shall advance to the within-named Z. B. Berlin any sum of money desired, not exceeding $2,200, said money so advanced to be used in paying for workmanship and material for building the house within required to be built. Said money so to be advanced shall be placed in the First National Bank of Omaha, subject to check, at the date when said Kountze is notified that work will commence on said building. But nothing herein shall be construed to mean that any money shall be advanced, unless work is commenced on said building within the time fixed by the within agreement for the commencement of work on said building. And the money so deposited shall be paid on checks of said Z. B. Berlin, accompanied by the estimates of the architect actually in charge of said building; and not to exceed 80 per cent of the amount due for work done, and material actually furnished, shall be paid on any estimate, and the remaining 20 per cent shall not be paid until the building is fully completed, and not then until ninety days have first elapsed, and proper proof is furnished that the building is clear of mechanic and other liens. All checks for the payment of money must bear the countersign of Herman Kountze before the same shall be paid by said bank, and duplicates of all contracts, bonds and vouchers shall be filed with the said Herman Kountze. No contract for work shall be let to irresponsible parties, and all contractors shall furnish good and sufficient security, in adequate amounts, for the faithful performance of their contracts; and that no mechanic or other liens will be allowed to go on said property; and that said property shall be clear of all liens or claims by reason of improvements put upon the same. At the option of said Kountze, party of the first part, this contract shall be surrendered to him when the money for the building is advanced, and a new contract entered into, and the consideration therein named to be the amount of money advanced by him, and the balance then unpaid on the lot herein referred to; and, if no new contract is executed, then all money advanced by said Kountze on this contract, to be used in building, shall be considered as part of the purchase money for said property."

On April 24, 1888, Kountze placed with the First National Bank of Omaha, to the credit of Berlin, $2,200, to be used in building the house provided for in the contract; and on June 7, 1888, for a like purpose, the further sum of $225 was deposited by him in said bank. Peterson & Co. contracted with Berlin to put up the building for $2,944. The house was erected, the extras on the job amounting to $249. The other lienholders were sub-contractors. The moneys placed in the bank were paid out for labor and materials on the architect's estimates, by the checks of Berlin, countersigned by Kountze. The decree of the district court gave Kountze a first lien for $5,009.72, the same being the unpaid purchase price, and the $2,200 first advanced for the construction of the house, with interest on the amounts. The mechanic lienholders were given liens for the amounts due them respectively, but junior to the above lien of Kountze for $5,009.72. Kountze was also given a lien for the amount of his second advancement, which was made junior to all other liens. The case is here on appeal from that part of the decree giving Kountze the prior lien.

Section 1 of the Mechanics' Lien Law provides that "any person who shall perform any labor, or furnish any material or machinery or fixtures, for the erection, preparation or removal of any house, mill, manufactory or building, or appurtenances, by virtue of a contract or agreement expressed or implied with the owner thereof, or his agents, shall have a lien to secure the payment of the same upon such house, mill, manufactory, building or appurtenance, and the lot of land upon which the same shall stand." The word "owner" as used in this section is not limited in its meaning to the one who holds the legal title, but embraces the equitable owner as well. Ordinarily, the lien of the mechanic attaches only to the interest of the one who causes the improvement to be made. The correct rule doubtless is where one holding land under a contract of purchase causes a building to be erected thereon, and the contract of sale contains no provision for the erection of a building, that the mechanics' lien is confined to the interest of the purchaser in the premises, and is subordinate to that of the vendor of the land, for unpaid purchase money. It is insisted by the appellants that, when the contract of sale of real estate stipulates that the purchaser shall erect on the land a building within a specified time, the mechanic who performs the labor, or furnishes the material, for the making of the improvement, is entitled to a lien against the interest of the vendor in the premises, as well as that of the vendee. The contract of sale in the case at bar not only authorized, but made it obligatory upon, the purchaser to erect a dwelling on the premises, of a certain value, within a fixed time. Further than that, Kountze stipulated to furnish not to exceed $2,200 towards the erection of the building. The proof shows that Kountze advanced that amount, and more, and that he approved the expenditure of the money. This is additional proof of the authority of the vendee to contract for the erection of the house, Kountze having, in the contract of sale, authorized his vendee to make the improvements; and, in pursuance of that authority, Berlin procured the labor to be performed, and the materials to be furnished, the vendor thereby subjecting his lien for the unpaid purchase money to the liens that might be acquired by the laborer and materialman for making the improvement. Where a vendee, owning the equitable title, contracts for the erection of a building, upon the express authority of the owner of the legal title, it is but just that the lien of the mechanic should attach to the interest of both vendor and vendee in the premises, and be paramount to the lien of the vendor; and this rule does not in any manner contravene any statutory provision. If any authority is necessary to support this construction it is not wanting. The case of Henderson v. Connolly, 123 Ill. 98,

11 West. Rep. 729, is similar in its facts to the one at bar. C. M. and W. S. Henderson sold certain real estate to one Sharp for $2,150. Part of the consideration was paid down, and the balance was to be paid in monthly payments. The contract of sale contained this clause: "And said Hendersons agree that, when said Sharp shall have expended $325 in the erection of a suitable dwelling-house upon said premises, they will advance him, as the progress of the building justifies, in their opinion, the further sum of $875, to aid in the completion thereof." J. G. Sharp, the vendee, subsequently employed Connelly to do the excavating, stone and brick work, and plastering for a house he proposed to erect on the premises. Connelly performed the labor, and furnished the material, according to his contract, amounting to $465.58, and filed his lien for the same. The Hendersons, during the progress of the work, advanced Sharp $700. Sharp having failed to make his payments to the Hendersons, the latter took possession of the property, and completed the house. Connelly brought suit to enforce a lien for labor and materials furnished under the contract with Sharp. Mr. Justice Craig, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The only reasonable and fair construction to be placed on this clause of the contract is that the purchaser was authorized and empowered by the vendors to enter into contracts with the builders to furnish material, and erect a building on the premises to which they hold the legal title. If, therefore, the Hendersons authorized and empowered Sharp, the purchaser, to cause a building to be erected on the property where the legal title was in them, upon what ground can they now, after the labor has been expended, and materials furnished, claim that the mechanic who furnished the labor and materials which they, by contract, authorized, shall look alone to the title held by the purchaser? Certainly no principle of equity or fair dealing would sanction a precedent of that character.

... The vendors, by their contract, have subjected their title to the property to the lien of the petitioner, and the decree properly, in our opinion, authorized a sale of the legal title, and a priority of payment to the petitioner." This case was afterwards approved by the same court in Paulsen v. Manake, 126 Ill. 72.

In May, 1889, the Supreme Court of Minnesota, in Hill v. Gill, 40 Minn. 441, upon similar facts, held that the lien of the mechanic attached to the interest of the vendor. The statutory provisions in Illinois and Minnesota relating to mechanics' liens are substantially the same as those in this State, and the decisions from those States are entitled to much weight. There are cases holding a contrary doctrine, some of which are cited in the brief of appellees; but, as they are contrary to the liberal rule of construction that has always prevailed in this State in construing the Mechanics' Lien Law, we do not follow them. The rule we adopt is the most just and equitable.

The decree of the District Court, in so far as it awarded the appellee Kountze the paramount lien on the premises, is reversed, and the decree will be modified in this court making his lien junior to that of the mechanic lienholders. In all other respects the decree is affirmed. Decree accordingly.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Louisville Chancery Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on certain promissory notes. Reversed in part.

December 17, 1887, appellee held a number of promissory notes signed by Edward and Robert F. Bull. On that day the notes were divided up and three separate suits in as many courts were instituted on them. The suits were subsequently all transferred to the Louisville Chancery Court, where, on March 8, 1889, they were consolidated and a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff on the notes to the payment of which the court subjected the income of a certain fund held in trust for defendants under the will of their father.

Pryor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These consolidated actions were heard together, and a judgment rendered for the Bank.

The defense relied on by the appellants is, that the Bank (appellee) agreed that new notes should be executed for the old notes then owing, and that William Cromey's name as an individual indorser should be substituted in lieu of his name as executor and trustee of Bull's estate, thereby releasing the estate of Bull from any and all responsibility upon the paper.

This new paper was executed in January, of the year 1886, and was given, as defendants allege, for the purpose of releasing the liability of the trust property, and making Cromey individually liable, when in fact the defendants say the Bank, in violation of its agreement, entered into an arrangement with the trustee, unknown to them, by which his liability as such was still continued regardless of the arrangement under which the new notes were executed, — the same now in controversy; they therefore deny the right of recovery.

The agreement or consideration for the renewal of these notes is established by Mrs. Bull and her sons, but denied by both Fetter, the president of the Bank, and by Cromey, the trustee, who in substance say that the entire arrangement, including that fixing the liability of the trustee, was made at the instance of the appellants. The appellants were the principal obligors in the greater part of this large indebtedness, and it is unreasonable to believe that the Bank would release solvent parties, to obtain, as an indorser or security, one who was insolvent. The evidence, however, is conflicting; and the chancellor in our opinion ruled properly on this branch of the case. The testimony shows that the notes originally discounted by the Bank were for the benefit of one or the other of the parties to them. The Bank parted with its money in good faith, and to those who are now parties to the renewal paper.

The loans may have been large and unusual, but, in the absence of fraud or bad faith on the part of the appellee, the liability of the parties to the paper cannot be questioned, and the right of the appellee to come into a court of equity, after exhausting the remedy at law for the purpose of obtaining relief, is equally plain.

The important question, and the only one necessary to be considered, arises from the will of John Bull, in that part of the devise to each of his sons by which it is provided that the rents and profits of the estate devised shall not be subject to the claims of any creditor.

Under our Statute construed by repeated decisions of this court, it has been held that where there is a beneficial interest in property, that interest may be subjected to the payment of the debts of the beneficiary. In the recent case of Bland's Admr. v. E. W. Bland, decided at the present term [Haycraft v. Bland, 9 L. R. A. 599], the interest of the devisee was held to be liable upon the ground that the provisions of the will attempted to exempt the estate, or its rents and profits, from being subjected to the payment of the debts of the devisee, and at the same time vesting in the devisee the absolute power of disposing of the whole estate as he might deem proper. That was a case in which the benefits of the rents and issues were taken from the devisee and added to the principal with the power given to the devisee to dispose of it by will as he pleased.

It is said in the opinion in that case that the profits or income of the estate were not in fact forfeited by reason of the attempt by the creditor to subject it, but only added to the principal, thus enlarging the estate the disposition of which was left alone to the beneficiary, if he saw proper to devise it. That being invested with such a title to hold that the devisee has no interest, is contrary to the plain provisions of the will. In the case before us the testator devised certain specified property to his two sons, to be held in trust by his executor, and to be controlled by him, during the lifetime of Edward and Robert (the sons), the executor to pay, in quarterly payments, the net proceeds of the rents and profits to the beneficiary. Following this devise to Edward, and a like devise to Robert, is this provision: "The said property shall not be in any manner incumbered by, nor shall it, or its rents or profits, be in any way anticipated by, or in any way subjected to, the debts of my son Edward, either by process of law, or by any order, assignment or contract he may make; and should it at any time be held by a court of last resort that said rents and profits are liable to be subjected to the debts of Edward, or liable to be anticipated or incumbered by him, then, in that event, I direct that my executor shall thenceforth pay the rents and profits of the said property to the wife of said Edward, for separate use, free from the debts or control of her said husband."

The feature distinguishing this case from that of Bland's Admr. v. Bland is that in the case of Bland the devisee was never divested of his interest, or deprived of his title, but was in fact given such an absolute estate as to exclude the idea that he was not in any sense a beneficiary.

Here the use, and, we might say, the life estate, ceases in Edward and becomes vested in his wife, so there is no estate in Edward for either himself or his creditors, and as the devisor (his father) had the power to make such a limitation, or create the defeasance, when disposing of his own estate, neither Edward nor his creditor can complain.

Equitable life estates, or a beneficial interest in the debtor, cannot escape subjection to the payment of his debts, but here he has no estate because the devise becomes diverted by the very terms of the will, that neither misleads nor deceives the creditor, who is trusting the beneficiary in the business transaction. It is said, however, the corpus of the estate is in Edward, and the rents or profits vested in his wife.

The estate is in the trustee with the right of Edward to the rents, to be paid him by the trustee as they become due and upon the condition expressed in the will of his father.

When you take from the principal devisee the use or enjoyment of the income, and this is all he is entitled to, nothing remains of the estate for him. There is no estate left in Edward that a chancellor can reach, or to which Edward could assert any right, after the happening of the event by which he is divested of title; and his wife becomes entitled to the rents and profits.

It is argued that this is a mere evasion of the Statute by which it is provided that "estates of every kind, held or possessed in trust, shall be subject to the debts and charges of the persons to whose use, or for whose benefit, they shall be respectively held or possessed, etc.—and that no such devise should receive the sanction of this court. That it was the purpose of the testator that his sons should use and enjoy the property devised to them unmolested by any creditor is apparent, but this affords no reason for disturbing the provisions of his will on this subject if by its terms their equitable interest was passed to others. It is a mistaken idea to say that the devise gave to the sons an equitable life estate in this property or in the rents and profits, as by the provisions of the will under which this title is passed to the sons they are to become divested of the title upon a certain contingency. The testator was not required to anticipate the extravagance of the beneficiaries of his bounty so as to provide for those who might thereafter become their creditors, but, on the contrary, the property devised belonging to him, he had the right, and it was his duty, to secure the sons, and particularly their families, against such a reckless use of their property as might reduce them to want. There is nothing in such a provision as affects a sound public policy, or makes this devise of the testator superior to the law of the land. The testator might as readily have devised the estate in the first place to the wives of his two sons or any they might thereafter have, in order to preserve it for their families, and the argument would then be used that this was done merely to enable the wives to hold the property that the sons might enjoy it and still the devise would be upheld.

Counsel seem to have overlooked the fact that this was the testator's own property he was disposing of, and not his sons', and argue as if the testator had no power to annex a condition to the devise that might terminate at once all interest the sons had in the property. It is said that there is no authority or precedent to be followed in this case, but after a careful examination of a number of cases we find the right of a testator to make such a disposition of his estate fully sustained, and have failed by reference to the authorities referred to by counsel for the appellees to find any single case in which their view of this question is maintained. Some of the authorities go to the extent of holding that the interest and dividends of real or personal property held in trust may be enjoyed by the beneficiary without liability for his debts. Nichols v. Eaton, 91 U. S. 716, 28 L. ed. 254.

This court has held the contrary doctrine, but has never gone so far as to adjudge that the beneficiary might not lose his estate upon the happening of a contingency provided by the terms of the trust. A testator cannot vest the title in a trustee for the use of another, and permit its enjoyment by the cestui que trust, without subjecting it to the debts of the latter. Thus is the rule in this State, and the doctrine recognized in this case is not inconsistent with it.

While the trustee holds the property for the use of the debtor he holds it subject to the claims of his creditors, but when the property or its profits is to be applied to the use of the beneficiary (the debtor) for a limited period, or until the happening of a certain event, when the title or the entire profit is to vest in another, then the right of the creditor to subject it for the debt of the first taker is gone. The testator provides "that if at any time it should be held by a court of last resort that said rents and profits are liable to be subjected to the debts of Edward, or liable to be anticipated or incumbered by him, then and in that event I direct my executor to pay the rents and profits of said property to the wife of Edward for her separate use free from the debts or control of her husband." Why should the executor hold the rents and profits any longer than the event contemplated by the testator? The will provides that he shall not, and the credit given the devisee is based on the title acquired under the will of his father. If he had a life estate, or was entitled to the rents and profits for life without any condition or limitation as to his right, the property could be subjected and the claim of the creditor enforced; or if any income was in the hands of the trustee that the beneficiary could demand paid over to him as a matter of right, to that extent the creditors would obtain relief, as in this case the income and profits were due and payable to the appellant up to the time he was divested of title, and the chancellor could subject it. It may be proper to consider the authorities, English and American, on this subject. In Lowes v. Lowes, 6 Sim. 304, the testator devised certain lands to trustees to receive rents and to pay a certain sum for the benefit of his son's family and the residue for the use of his son with no power on the part of his son to change or alienate it, and that it should not be subject to the claims of creditors. The will also provided that if the son violated the provisions of the trust, the residue should not be paid to him, but should be accumulated. The trustee conveyed the property for creditors and it was held that his interest in the residue ceased.

In Brandon v. Robinson, 18 Ves. Jr. 429, Lord Eldon said: "There is no doubt that property may be given to a man until he shall become bankrupt. It is equally clear, generally speaking, that if property is given to a man for his life, the donor cannot take away the incidents of a life estate. If a condition is so expressed as to amount to a limitation reducing the interest short of a life estate, neither the man nor his assignees can have it beyond the period limited." This statement of the Lord Chancellor embraces the whole law in this class of cases.

In the case of Oldham v. Oldham, reported in L. R. 3 Eq. Cas. 404, before the master of the rolls, the question was whether Oldham had been divested of his life interest in an annuity by entering into a composition with creditors, the annuity to pass to the wife in the event he should anticipate or dispose of the fund or should have a fiat in bankruptcy duly issued against him. He pledged this future income, and in a contest between the creditors of Oldham and the trustees it was adjudged that the stipulations of the trust should be executed and that his life interest was gone.

In the case of Shes v. Hale, 18 Ves. Jr. 404, John Morthan by his will bequeathed to his son, through trustees, an annuity of £200 during his life with the condition that it was to fall into the residuum of the estate in the event his son should sell, assign or part with the same as a security for money to be advanced, or should anticipate the same by pledging, etc., except only as to the then next annual quarterly payment. The son took the benefit of the Insolvent Act, and, his assignees claiming the annuity, it was held that the assignees could not take the fund but that it passed as directed by the will.

The doctrine of the English courts is well settled on the point involved, and the courts of this country have followed it, and in Nichols v. Eaton, 91 U. S. 716, 28 L. ed. 254, were not disposed to accept the doctrine in so far as it restricted the power of testamentary disposition so as to prevent the beneficiary from using and enjoying the benefits of the devise against the claims of creditors. In that case the bankruptcy of the devisee was by the will to terminate all his interest in the estate, and his creditors were denied the right to the estate or its profits after the act of bankruptcy. Where the debtor who is the beneficiary has any substantial right in the property that a chancellor can enforce, then, so long as that right continues, his interest is liable for his debts, but no longer. The event happening upon which the interest passes to another, the creditor is without remedy.

Nor are we without precedent establishing the doctrine that the event upon which the beneficiary may be divested of title may be the decision of a chancellor subjecting the interest or income to the payment of the debts of the cestui que trust.

Joshua Ferris died in 1848, leaving this codicil to his will: "I hereby declare in making provision in my will that the income of one third of my estate upon payment of debts and legacies should be paid to my son Myron H. Ferris it was my design to make provision for the support of himself and family which could not be taken from them by his creditors, and, for the purpose of making myself more plainly understood on this point and to carry out said design, it is my will that in case creditors' bill shall be filed or any proceedings instituted against my son Myron for the purpose of reaching the interest or income so provided for him and diverting it from the object intended by me, and a decree or judgment obtained for that purpose, that then, from that period, the said interest or income shall cease; and I direct my executors from thenceforth to expend the said interest or income for the support of the family of the said Myron H. Ferris, either by paying the same to his wife, or in any other practicable way in their discretion."

The controversy was in that case between the creditors of the son and the devisees over or the executors. The New York Court of Appeals was then presided over by Denio as chief justice with three associates, and the supreme court judges, five in number, ex officio members of the court of appeals at the time that case was decided. Separate opinions were delivered from each court holding without dissent the provision of the will of Ferris that the interest of the devisees should cease on the recovery of a judgment by creditors was valid.

In the case of White v. Thomas, 8 Bush, 661, the will provided that the right of another to use the property devised should not be subject to alienation or sale, and that the right to the use should terminate upon an attempt to do so by the beneficiary or his creditors. This provision was upheld on the ground that Mr. White had no interest in the property.

These cases, it seems to us, should be conclusive of the question raised, and in no wise subvert the rule of law that one vested with an interest in property cannot use or enjoy it to the exclusion of creditors. Nor can the deviser, who has attempted to secure an estate for the benefit of those who are to take under him, be charged with fraud in endeavoring to anticipate the wants of his sons or their families, or liable to the charge of contriving, in violation of law, to place the estate devised beyond the reach of his son's creditors. It was his estate. He had the right to place the limitation upon its duration, and the creditor dealing with the son knew the nature of his title.

A judgment subjecting the income due at the date this opinion was delivered should be entered and then all the interest of the sons ceases in the profits and income of the property. Judgment below is reversed that such a judgment may be entered; in all other respects it is affirmed.

NOTE.—Constructive notice, when conclusive.

When a person has information or knowledge of certain extraneous facts sufficient to put a reasonably prudent person on inquiry, and the circumstances are such that inquiry, if pursued with reasonable care and diligence, would lead to a discovery of the truth, the party will be absolutely charged with such constructive notice as will raise a conclusive presumption of knowledge. *Chicago, R. ### Rule applied to commercial paper taken overdue.

It is an elementary principle of commercial law that negotiable paper overdue carries with it, on its very face, notice of defective title sufficient to put transferee on inquiry. *Hinckley v. (January 13, 1891.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hamilton County to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas allowing, in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage, the claim set up in a cross-petition to the effect that the cross petitioner was the rightful owner of the first lien on the mortgaged property, and that the whole of his claim was due and unpaid. Reversed.

Statement by Dickman, J.:

The original action was brought in the Court of Common Pleas of Hamilton County, by Joseph N. Kinney against Warren Durham, defendant in error, and his wife, and Robert Kernohan, the plaintiff in error, to foreclose a mortgage on 27½ acres of land in Anderson Township, Hamilton County, executed November 9, 1868, by Durham and his wife to William R. McGill, to secure the payment of two certain promissory notes of that date for $1,000 each, signed by Durham, and made payable respectively to McGill or order in one and two years after date, Kinney claiming to hold and own the notes and mortgage, through indorsement and assignment by McGill, the payee and mortgagee. Stephen Coddington, defendant in error, who was made a party defendant, and Robert Kernohan, each filed an answer and cross-petition, setting up his interest in the real estate described in the petition, and denying that the plaintiff had any lien on said real estate by mortgage or otherwise. Answers of Durham and his wife and other pleadings were filed, and the action was tried to the court upon the following agreed statement of facts:

"The parties to this action agree that the following are all the facts of this case, and all the evidence of the parties to the action, viz.: Warren Durham was indebted to W. R. McGill on notes and mortgage executed November 9 1868, for $2,000, payable one and two years after date, respectively. In November, 1879, Durham had a settlement with McGill of said mortgage debt then amounting to $3,250, and on the 26th day of November, 1879, Durham gave to McGill a new note for that amount, payable one year after date, and to secure the payment of said last note of $3,250 Durham at the same time executed and delivered his mortgage deed of the real estate described in the petition to said McGill. The old notes and mortgage paid by the execution of the new were not present at the place of settlement, but were to be returned by McGill to Durham as soon as he, McGill, returned to his home in Newton, the new note and mortgage being made in Cincinnati. In 1884 McGill gave to the plaintiff, Kinney, the paid notes and mortgage (never having returned them to Durham) as collateral security for a loan then made from Kinney, and they were so received by said Kinney, who was ignorant of the transactions between Durham and McGill. The said McGill being also indebted to the defendant Kernohan, as a collateral, he, McGill, assigned and transferred to Kernohan before the maturity of the $3,250 note the mortgage given to secure said note, and also a note for $3,250, or what purported to be Durham's note. The assignment on the mortgage is:

"For value received, I assign and transfer the within mortgage and the note secured thereby to Robert Kernohan, his representatives and assigns.

"July 21, 1880.

Wm. R. McGill.

"Entered April 5, 1884. George W. Rabenstein, Recorder."

"Afterwards, on the 22d of February, 1881, McGill being also indebted to the defendant Coddington in the sum of $1,250 and interest, as a collateral, indorsed and delivered to Coddington the genuine note for $3,250 aforesaid, secured by the mortgage aforesaid for that amount. Coddington received said note, and relied upon McGill's promise to deliver the mortgage in good faith and for value, and without any knowledge or information as to the previous assignment of the mortgage until proved on the trial. It is agreed the note given to Kernohan of $3,250 is a forgery, and that the mortgage given to him was the genuine mortgage, and that the note held by Coddington is the genuine note for $3,250, secured by the mortgage. McGill promised Coddington to deliver him the mortgage also, which he never did do, but that Kernohan received said note and mortgage and contract of assignment thereof in good faith and for value, and without any knowledge or information as to said forgery until proven on said trial. Durham, the maker of the note, had no knowledge of these transactions by McGill, and afterwards McGill called upon him from time to time for payments on his note, stating to Durham he would credit the payments upon his note when he went to the safe deposit where the note was kept for safety. These payments made in good faith were as follows: March 1, 1880, $200; October 2, 1880, $200; December 27, 1881, $165; October 10, 1882, $150; December 25, 1882, $50; in all, $765."

Upon this state of facts the court found for the defendants as to the plaintiff, and ordered that the plaintiff's petition be dismissed, and, as to him, that the defendants go hence without day, and that the mortgage sued on by the plaintiff be canceled; and as to Coddington the court found for the defendants as to his cross-petition, and ordered that his cross-petition be dismissed, and that the defendants thereto go hence without day; and as to Kernohan the court found for him, and that the allegations in his cross-petition were true; that the equity of the case was with him; that by assignment he became entitled to, and the owner before maturity and in good faith and for value of, the promissory note for $3,250, described in his cross-petition, and the mortgage given November 26, 1879, to secure payment of the same; that said mortgage was duly recorded, and was the first and best lien on the real estate described in the plaintiff's petition and in the cross-petition of Kernohan; that Durham was not, as against Kernohan, entitled to credits for the sums paid by him to McGill; and that there was due to Kernohan from Warren Durham on the note for $3,250 and the mortgage to secure payment of the same, with 8 per cent interest from November 26, 1879, the sum of $4,741.75. Judgment was entered for Kernohan in accordance with the above findings, to which Warren Durham and Stephen Coddington duly excepted. On petition in error by Durham and Coddington the circuit court held that the court of common pleas erred in finding that Durham was not entitled to credit for the payments made by him upon the mortgage note; that said court erred in finding that the lien of Coddington was a junior lien to that of Robert Kernohan; and that said court erred in finding that Kernohan was entitled to be first paid his claim out of the proceeds of the mortgaged premises. It was therefore ordered and adjudged that the findings, judgment and decree, and orders of the court of common pleas, be set aside, reversed and held for naught; that the cause be remanded to the court of common pleas for a new trial, with instructions to said court to allow to Durham, upon such new trial, a credit for all the payments upon the note and mortgage made to McGill; and that the liens, as between Coddington and Kernohan, upon the mortgaged premises be found as follows, viz.: Coddington's debt to be a valid lien, and the first lien thereon, and Kernohan's debt to be a valid lien, and the second lien thereon. To which judgment of the circuit court Kernohan excepted, and asks this court to reverse the same.

Messrs. Wulsin & Perkins and Frank O. Squire, for plaintiff in error:

Coddington never became the owner of the debt secured by the mortgage, nor of the note evidencing such debt. It is the debt as such, and not the note as such, which is secured by the mortgage.

Messrs. S. B. Deal and Mallon & Coffee for defendants in error.

Dickman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petition of Kinney, the plaintiff in the original action, having been dismissed, and judgment rendered against him, to which he took no exception, and instituted no proceeding in error, the only questions which we need consider are: (1) Whether Kernohan, as against Coddington, is entitled to be first paid his lien out of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises; and (2) whether Durham is entitled to credit for his payments, or any portion thereof, upon the note of $3,250, executed by him to McGill or order, on November 26, 1879, made payable one year after date, and secured by mortgage on real estate.

1. As conceded in the agreed statement of facts, McGill, being indebted to Kernohan, assigned and transferred to him, as collateral security, before the maturity of Durham's note for the above-named amount, the mortgage executed to secure the payment of the same and what purported to be the genuine note itself, but which proved to be a forgery of the note. The assignment on the mortgage reads as follows: "For value received I assign and transfer the within mortgage and the note secured thereby to Robert Kernohan, his representatives and assigns. July 21, 1880. Wm. R. McGill."

After the maturity of the note, to wit, on February 22, 1881, McGill, being also indebted to Coddington, indorsed and delivered to him as collateral security the genuine note. Coddington, relying upon the promise of McGill to deliver to him the mortgage,—which he never did deliver,—received the note in good faith and for value, and without any knowledge or information as to the previous assignment of the mortgage to Kernohan, until proved on the trial; and Kernohan received the forged note and mortgage and contract of assignment thereof in good faith, and for value, and without any knowledge or information as to the forgery, until the forgery was proven on the trial. Prior to the adoption of the Code of Civil Procedure, in an action at law by the indorsee and holder of a promissory note, payable to any person or order, against the maker, the maker could not, when he did not deny the signature and indorsement, defend against the indorsee on the ground that he was not the owner of the paper; nor could a third party, except in equity, intervene and claim the note. Sections 1, 2, Act Feb. 25, 1820 (1 Swan & C. 862); sections 8171, 8172, Rev. Stat.; Way v. Richardson, 3 Gray, 412. Section 8172 of the Revised Statutes provides that an indorsee, to whom such note is made payable by indorsement, may in his own name institute and maintain an action thereon against the maker. But by section 4993 of the Revised Statutes (formerly sections 25 and 26 of the Code) all actions must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as provided in sections 4994 and 4995. This provision of the Code applies to negotiable paper. If, therefore, the note is not transferred to the indorsee in good faith and upon good consideration, before maturity, it is a good defense for the maker to show that the indorsee is not the real party in interest, unless he is authorized to sue under section 4994 or 4995; and the real owner may intervene and by cross-petition obtain the relief to which he is entitled as against the indorsee or holder, who is the apparent owner. Kernohan accordingly, in his cross-petition, claims that the note for $3,250 was never lawfully assigned to or held by Coddington; that the mortgage security was never owned or held by Coddington, and that he has no lien on or interest in the mortgaged premises; and that he, Kernohan, is the owner of the note and mortgage, and has the first and best lien on the real estate in the mortgage described. An issue of ownership is thus presented between the two claimants of the note and mortgage, both claiming to derive a good title from McGill, the payee. As between Kernohan and McGill, the ownership beyond dispute passed from the payee to Kernohan. Before the maturity of the note the payee, for value, assigned and transferred to Kernohan, in writing, the mortgage and the note thereby secured. The mortgage was delivered at the time of the assignment, and by the simultaneous indorsement and delivery of the forged note, as evidence of the debt secured, Kernohan became the holder and owner of the equitable title to the genuine note. It was negotiable paper, to which he acquired title before it fell due, for a good consideration, and without notice of any defect in the instrument that was delivered. While McGill, by retaining the genuine note, may have been its apparent owner, he was as to Kernohan a fraudulent holder, and the latter, had he discovered the fraud, might have compelled McGill to deliver to him the genuine paper. As to legal obligation, the position of McGill was not very different from what it would have been had he delivered the genuine note to Kernohan and afterwards stolen it from him. McGill, after the transfer, had no longer any interest in the note or mortgage, and at most was only a trustee for Kernohan.

What now are the rights of Coddington? The genuine note, indorsed by the payee in blank, was indorsed and delivered to him when overdue. It came to him dishonored, for the fact that it was unpaid after maturity was a circumstance of suspicion. Such a note, past due, no longer represented a distinct and definite credit, or money to be paid at a certain period. Coddington, in taking the paper, was thus put upon inquiry. He knew that the note was secured by mortgage, and was put upon his guard when the mortgage, his main security, was not produced at the time the note was indorsed and delivered. McGill at the time promised to deliver to him the mortgage, but he never did deliver it. Coddington relied upon the promise, and took the risk. Had he exercised the requisite care and diligence, he might have found that the mortgage was no longer in the possession of McGill, but had, seven months before, been assigned and transferred to Kernohan. Coddington, we think, should be held as having constructive notice of the rights of Kernohan in the note and mortgage. In Sterry v. Arden, 1 Johns. Ch. 261, 1 L. ed. 183, Chancellor Kent uses the language: "I hold him chargeable with constructive notice, or notice in law; because he had information sufficient to put him upon inquiry." Whenever a party has information or knowledge of certain extraneous facts, which of themselves do not amount to nor tend to show an actual notice, but which are sufficient to put a reasonably prudent man upon inquiry respecting a conflicting interest, claim or right, and the circumstances are such that the inquiry, if made and followed up with reasonable care and diligence, would lead to a discovery of the truth,—to a knowledge of the interest, claim or right which really exists,—the party is absolutely charged with a constructive notice of such interest, claim or right. The presumption of knowledge is then conclusive. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 608. Coming into possession of the note as he did, Coddington should be in no better position than McGill, so far as Kernohan is concerned, and should stand in the relation of a trustee for Kernohan. Negotiable paper, not paid at maturity, being regarded as dishonored, that fact is equivalent to notice that there is something wrong with it; and he who purchases it when so overdue obtains only such title and rights as were had by his vendor. 1 Edwards, Bills and Notes, § 517, and cases cited.

In Crossley v. Ham, 18 East, 498, the rule is laid down that one who acquires the bill or note after maturity is chargeable with constructive notice of any flaw in the right or title of his transferrer. And in Angle v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co., 92 U. S. 841, 23 L. ed. 560, it is held that a person who takes a bill which, upon the face of it, was dishonored, cannot be allowed to claim the privileges which belong to a bona fide holder. If he chooses to receive it under the circumstances, he takes it with all the infirmities belonging to it, and is in no better condition than the person from whom he received it. The authorities are numerous to the effect that the purchaser of an overdue or dishonored bill, who buys it from one who is not the owner, and who is not authorized to sell, acquires no title as against the true owner.

Spencer, J., in Henderson v. Case, 81 La. Ann. 215, applying to negotiable instruments the general principle that governs the transfer of personal property, says that after dishonor the bill or note falls under the dominion of that fundamental rule of property that "the sale of the thing of another is void." "Purchasers of notes or bonds past due take nothing but the actual right and title of the vendors." Chase, Ch. J., in Texas v. White, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 785, 19 L. ed. 240.

This species of property, when purchased overdue from one who is not the real owner and has no authority to sell, is thus placed in the same class with other goods and made subject to the well-recognized rule that if the seller was not the owner, and had no authority from the owner to sell, the buyer will have no title whatever to the property he has bought as against the true owner, although purchased in the ordinary course of trade. Roland v. Grady, 5 Ohio, 299.

Buying the paper after it is dishonored, the purchaser who, when put on his guard, does not seek the knowledge which he might obtain by using reasonable diligence, cannot complain if the law charges him with constructive notice of such infirmity of title as attaches to the instrument in the hands of him from whom he acquired it, and permits him only to stand in the shoes of his vendor or indorser. Nor is the indorsee or purchaser after maturity placed in such situation only as regards equities that may exist between the maker of the note and the payee, who indorsed or transferred the instrument.

It is held in England that, if there be an equity attaching directly to the bill or note itself, it may be asserted against an indorsee after maturity by a third party who claims the right to follow the bill. And Mr. Daniel, in his work on Negotiable Instruments, says: "If the equity be a claim of some right to the instrument directly attached to it, we perceive no good reason why it may not be asserted against an indorsee after maturity by any party whatsoever." Section 726b.

In the case at bar the outstanding equitable title in Kernohan to the note in question was an equity attaching to the instrument itself, which he might assert against Coddington, the indorsee, after maturity.

This doctrine is well illustrated in the case Re European Bank, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 858, where bills transferred after maturity were purchased with money stolen from one who claimed the bills as owner. Demetrio Papa, the manager of the Oriental Bank, abstracted moneys of that bank, and with them bought certain overdue bills of exchange. In April, 1867, the Eastern Bank, promoted by Papa, was registered, of which, until the following July, Papa was the sole director. These bills Papa sold to the Eastern Bank, and paid himself for them out of its funds. The Eastern Bank, as the holder, having proved the bills against the company on which they were drawn and accepted, to wit, the European Bank, it was held that the claim of the Oriental Bank to the bills, as having been purchased with its money, was an equity attaching to the bills; that the Eastern Bank, having purchased them overdue, took subject to this equity. "The bills," said Sir G. M. Giffard, L. J., "were overdue when the Eastern Bank took them. There were equities affecting the bills; and the Eastern Bank has no better title, either legal or equitable, than Demetrio Papa." In this case the court followed the rights of third parties, although their connection with the bills or title to the same was only an equitable one founded upon the doctrine of resulting or presumptive trusts. That Coddington, as indorsee of the note after maturity, acquired no better title to it than McGill had as against Kernohan, finds ample support in the case of Osborn v. McClelland, 43 Ohio St. 284, 1 West. Rep. 221. Mrs. Osborn, for value received, made and delivered to Mrs. Faxon her negotiable note, payable to the order of Mrs. Faxon in five years, secured by mortgage. Two years before the same became due, Mrs. Faxon, without consideration, and solely for the accommodation of Bartlit & Smith, bankers, loaned the same temporarily to them, to enable them to use the same as collaterals for a loan to meet a present emergency, Bartlit & Smith promising to safely keep and return them. Bartlit & Smith did not use them, but they were suffered to remain in their custody until after the note became due, when Smith, the survivor of Bartlit & Smith, without the knowledge of Mrs. Faxon, or without authority from her, hypothecated them to McClelland by delivery, merely saying the note would be paid. McClelland took the same in good faith, and for full value, but without inquiry, guaranty or indorsement by Smith, relying solely on his possession and the blank indorsement of Mrs. Faxon that Smith was the owner. It was held that McClelland, having acquired the note after due, and without inquiry, acquired no better title than Smith had; and, as Smith had neither title nor interest which was good against Mrs. Faxon, he transferred none to McClelland that in equity gave him the right to foreclose the mortgage as against the real owner. Smith was, in fact, a mere bailee or custodian, with no interest in the note. He was, however, lawfully in possession of it as legal holder, which, with the indorsement in blank by Mrs. Faxon, were badges of ownership. The mortgage was hypothecated, and delivered, with the note, to McClelland, and its absence, therefore, could not, as in the case at bar, excite suspicion, and prompt inquiry. But, the note being past due and discredited when transferred to McClelland, he was not permitted to divest Mrs. Faxon of the true ownership. If Smith, into whose custody the note had lawfully come, could confer upon his transferee no better right or title than he himself had, still less could McGill, who held the genuine note through gross fraud practiced upon Kernohan, give a better right or title to it than he himself had.

In the case of Greenwell v. Haydon, 78 Ky. 832, there was a contention between the appellant and appellee as to the ownership of a coupon bond. Cofer, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "There is another class of cases in which the title to the obligation was involved. The case at bar belongs to that class. There is no question here between the holder and the maker. It is a question as to the right to receive whatever sum the maker may owe, and not as to whether the maker shall pay his obligation in whole or in part. This distinction seems not to have been always kept in view, and, as a natural result, the authorities are in some confusion, decisions in one class of cases being often quoted in the discussion of cases belonging to another class." But the conclusion reached in the opinion was that whoever takes a bill or negotiable note after maturity takes it, so far as the title to and integrity of the paper is concerned, upon the credit of the person from whom he receives it. He gets whatever right and title that person had, and no more.

2. Is Durham, the maker, entitled to credit, as against Kernohan, for the several sums paid by him to McGill on the note? Those payments were made in part before the transfer of the note and mortgage to Kernohan, and before the maturity of the note, and partly after the indorsement and delivery of the genuine note to Coddington, to wit, after its maturity. But when Durham made payments on his note from time to time to McGill the note was not produced, and no receipt or memorandum of payment was ever noted on the instrument except one indorsement of interest on the day of maturity, McGill stating to Durham that he would credit the payments upon his note when he went to the safe deposit, where the note was kept for safety, and Durham relying upon the statement, without seeing that the credit was actually given. The rule is well established that part payment made on a negotiable instrument should be minuted or entered on the paper itself; and when the instrument comes into the hands of a bona fide holder for value before maturity, with no memorandum or other notice of part payment thereon, it cannot be set up as a defense against him. 3 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1414.

In Brayley v. Ellis, 71 Iowa, 155, it is said that ordinarily the maker of a note, when he makes a partial payment thereon, sees that it is properly indorsed on the note. In that case, where the mortgagee of land sold and assigned the secured notes before maturity, and afterwards fraudulently, and without the knowledge of his assignee, received from the mortgagor, who was led to believe that he still owned the notes, a partial payment thereon, taking only a receipt therefor, and the mortgagor afterwards sold the land to another, it was held, in an action by the assignee to foreclose the mortgage, that he was entitled to recover, as against the mortgagor and the land, the whole amount of the notes, regardless of the partial payment so negligently made by the mortgagor. See also Clark v. Igelstrom, 51 How. Pr. 407; Chitty, Bills, 428; Cooper v. Davies, 1 Esp. 463; 2 Edwards, Bills and Notes, § 783; Brown v. Blydenburgh, 7 N. Y. 141; 1 Jones, Mort. § 956.

Five several payments were made, in good faith, by Durham to the payee, of which there was no memorandum on the note. The non-production of the paper at the time was sufficient to awaken inquiry, and did draw from the payee a promise that he would give the proper credits. Had the genuine, instead of the spurious, note been transferred to Kernohan, unquestionably he would have held it free from any deduction of payments by Durham that were not apparent on the paper itself. He would not have been subject to other equities between the maker and payee. It is true, McGill did not transfer to Kernohan the genuine note, but a forged note in its stead. Yet Durham permitted the genuine note, notwithstanding his payments, to continue in all respects as when it first left his hands, with no mark or acknowledgment upon it of the payment of the several sums he paid from time to time; and when McGill transferred the forged instrument to Kernohan it was the counterfeit presentment of the note as Durham had negligently suffered it to remain, with nothing thereon to indicate a reduction of the amount called for on its face. If Durham had demanded that the note and mortgage be exhibited in order that his payments might be indorsed on the note, he would have discovered that on July 21, 1880, the mortgage was transferred to Kernohan, and might also have discovered by due investigation the fraud of McGill, and the situation and true ownership of the note. Under the circumstances we think that Durham failed to exercise the ordinary care in having the amounts paid by him properly credited on his note; and, as against Kernohan, no allowance should be made to him for any portion of those amounts out of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises. As to Coddington, an indorsee after maturity, he took the note subject to all payments that had been made by Durham at the time he received the instrument, but free from any of the payments made by Durham to McGill after he received the note.

From the foregoing considerations our conclusion is that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be reversed, and that of the Court of Common Pleas affirmed.

Judgment accordingly.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles

County, in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to quiet title to certain real estate.

Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Chapman & Hendrick for appellants.

Messrs. E. Edgar Galbreth and Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson for respondents.

The case was originally heard in Department 1, where on January 25, 1890, Hayne, C. filed the following opinion:

Suit to quiet title. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. In 1880 the owner of the property died leaving a will by which the whole property was devised to the widow, who was made sole executrix without bonds, and it was provided that "she have absolute power to sell any or all of said real and personal property at public or private sale, with or without advertisement, and without application to any court, and without approval or authority of any court whatever." The will was admitted to probate, and letters testamentary were issued to the widow. Acting under the power contained in the will, she sold the property to the defendant Eliza J. Olmstead without obtaining an order of sale from the probate court. She reported her proceedings to the court, however, and an order confirming the sale was made, and a conveyance executed. The plaintiffs are the four minor children of the testator. They were not mentioned or in any way referred to in the will, and claim as pretermitted heirs. The main question argued is whether the power of sale given by the will authorized a sale of the children's interests without the previous sanction of the probate court required by the Code of Civil Procedure in ordinary cases. This seems to us to be a question of construction. The provision of the Civil Code in relation to a child of whom no mention is made in a will is that he "must have the same share in the estate of the testator as if he had died intestate, and succeeds thereto as provided in the preceding section." Civil Code, § 1807. The "preceding section" is in relation to children born after the making of the will, either during the lifetime of the testator or after his death, and provides that such a child "succeeds to the same portion of the testator's real and personal property that he would have succeeded to if the testator had died intestate." So far as the question in hand is concerned these provisions are in substance the same as those of the Statute of Wills previously in force. The provision of the Code of Civil Procedure in relation to powers of sale is substantially the same as section 178 of the old Probate Act, as amended in 1861, and is as follows: "Sec. 1561. When property is directed by the will to be sold, or authority is given in the will to sell property, the executor may sell any property of the estate without order of the court, and at either public or private sale, and with or without notice, as the executor may determine, but the executor must make return of such sales as in other cases; and if directions are given in the will as to the mode of selling, or the particular property to be sold, such directions must be observed. In either case, no title passes unless the sale be confirmed by the court."

We do not find that the cases in this State cited by counsel determine the question presented.

In Delaney's Estate, 49 Cal. 76, it was held that where the legal title is devised to the executor the provisions requiring order of sale, confirmation, etc., do not apply.

In Durham's Estate, Id. 495, it was held that where the legal title is not devised to the executor, and he has a naked power of sale, the provision requiring a confirmation applies, and that such confirmation must be according to prescribed formalities. The latter decision is not in point, because here there was a confirmation, to which no objection is taken. And the former decision is not in point, because it is settled that the legal title descends to and vests in the pretermitted heir, who becomes a tenant in common with the devisees, if there are any valid devisees. Pearson v. Pearson, 46 Cal. 627. This latter case, however, while it shows that the rule laid down in Delaney's Estate has no application, does not determine the question involved here, which is whether the omitted child takes the title subject to the power of sale or not.

In Oregon it has been held that a power of sale in a will does not cover the interest of a posthumous child not mentioned in the will. Northrop v. Marquam, 16 Or. 173. In that State, however, the Statute provided that so far as such child was concerned the testator "shall be deemed to die intestate," which is somewhat broader language than that of our Statute.

In New York the Statute is substantially the same as ours. And in that State it is held that the share of a child born between the making of the will and the death of the testator, and not mentioned in the will, is not affected by a power of sale contained in the will. Smith v. Robertson, 89 N. Y. 558.

The argument in favor of the omitted child seems to be that if the testator had died intestate the interest of such child could only be sold in certain cases, and after certain formalities, and that the Statute provides, in substance, that the omitted child shall inherit from the testator "as if he had died intestate." The argument, on the other side, is that the Statute only provides that the omitted child shall inherit "the same share" as if the testator had died intestate, and that while such share goes to the child it is subject to the other provisions of the will. Each of these arguments seems to us to assume the real question in dispute. And the case is such that no satisfactory conclusion can be reached from a consideration of the mere language of the Statute. But we think that a due regard for the interests of pretermitted heirs requires that the safeguards provided by law against improper sales of their property should only be dispensed with in a clear case; that this cannot be said to be a clear case, because the law presumes that the omission of all mention of a child was from accident, misapprehension or forgetfulness, and it cannot be concluded with any degree of certainty that the testator would have given a power of sale of the child's interest if the fact that it would have an interest had been present to his mind. If, for example, a testator supposes that his child is dead, and under that belief devises his whole property to one not of his blood, it is very natural that he should make such devisee sole executor, and give him unrestricted power of sale. But would he have given such power to the devisee if he had known that his child was alive, and would inherit the whole estate? Upon the whole, though the matter is not free from doubt, we think it better that the rule laid down by the New York case should be followed, viz.: that, inasmuch as the devise of the child's interest is inoperative, the power of sale of his interest should be construed not to apply to it. The order of confirmation was not conclusive of the legality of the sale. We therefore advise that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: Belcher, C. C.; Gibson, C.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

A rehearing was subsequently granted and on April 3, 1891, DeHaven, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for the purpose of determining conflicting claims to real property. The record shows that one Z. B. Smith, now deceased, in his lifetime made his last will, by which, after directing the payment of his debts, he in terms gave to his wife all of his property, with "absolute power to sell any or all of said real and personal property, at public or private sale with or without advertisement, and without any application to any court, and without approval or authority of any court whatever." In a subsequent clause the wife was also named as executrix of the will. She duly qualified as such, and sold to the defendants the property described in the complaint. Such sale was made without any previous order therefor, but was afterwards confirmed by the court in which the administration of her deceased husband's estate was pending. The land was community property. The record does not show that the sale was necessary for any of the reasons stated in section 1536 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that is, in order "to pay the allowance of the family, or the debts outstanding against the decedent, or the debts, expenses or charges of administration, or legacies." The plaintiffs are minor children of the said Z. B. Smith, deceased, and are not provided for in said will; nor does the will show that the omission to provide for them was intentional. There has never been any distribution of this property, and the administration of the estate of said Smith is still pending. The judgment of the court below was in favor of plaintiffs, and the defendants appeal. This judgment was affirmed by Department 1 of this court, on January 25, 1890, but a rehearing was granted, and the case is now before the court in bank for determination.

The question for decision is whether, upon the facts as here stated, the power of sale contained in the will is so far operative against the plaintiffs that a sale made under it, and confirmed by the court, transferred to the defendants the title to the land in controversy. To determine this, a brief reference to the plain language of the law, relating to wills, and the right to succession of property of a decedent in the absence of a will disposing of it, is necessary. By section 1907 of the Civil Code it is provided that where a testator omits to provide in his will for any of his children, unless it appears that such omission was intentional, such child "must have the same share in the estate of the testator as if he had died intestate, and succeeds thereto, as provided in the preceding section." That is, "the child succeeds to the same portion of the testator's real and personal property that he would have succeeded to if the testator had died intestate." Civil Code, § 1906.

We are unable to construe these sections otherwise than as declaring that the pretermitted child succeeds immediately, by operation of law, to the same portion of the testator's real property as if no will had been made; that as to such portion the testator is to be regarded as dying intestate, and its succession is directed by law, and not by the will. And, as a necessary legal consequence of this construction, it would follow that every provision in the will, directly or indirectly attempting to dispose of such portion of the estate, except for the discharge of the decedent's debts, or other charges accruing in due course of administration, is inoperative as against such child. As to the rights of a pretermitted child, under these sections, this court has heretofore held: "In other words, the child succeeds to the same portion of the testator's real and personal property that he would have succeeded to if the testator had died intestate." Wardell's Estate, 57 Cal. 489. Sections 16 and 17 of the Act concerning wills, (Hit. Gen. Laws, p. 1086), and section 1 of the Statute of Descents and Distributions (Id. p. 823), are substantially the same as the provisions of our Civil Code relating to the same subjects; and this court in Pearson v. Pearson, 46 Cal. 609, basing its decision on these Statutes, held, explicitly, that the pretermitted child takes the same share in the estate, and holds by the same title, as though the testator had died intestate.

Now, in the case of a person dying intestate, his estate descends and vests immediately in his heirs, subject only to the payment of the debts of decedent, the expenses of administration and the family allowance. This is not only clear from sections 1838, 1834, 1886 and 1403 of the Civil Code, but was so expressly held by this court in Brenham v. Story, 39 Cal. 168, under statutes substantially the same, the court saying: "Upon the death of the ancestor, the heir becomes vested at once with the full property, subject to the liens we have mentioned; and, subject to these liens and the temporary right of possession of the administrator, he may at once sell and dispose of the property, and has the same right to judge for himself of the relative advantages of selling or holding that any other owner has." The respondents in this case were, immediately upon the death of their father, clothed by operation of law with such a title to the property in controversy, and, this being its nature and extent, it is clear that such title was not divested by the sale made by the executrix of their father's will, under the circumstances disclosed by the record in this case. A title to property, which is so full and complete that its possessor has "the same right to judge for himself of the relative advantages of selling or holding that any other owner has," cannot co-exist with the right of another to transfer such property at discretion, and the power exercised by the executrix in this case, being inconsistent with the title which the law vested in the respondents upon the death of the father, cannot be upheld. These views are in harmony with the decisions of other States where statutes relating to wills and right of succession are similar to our own. See Northrop v. Marquam, 16 Or. 173; Smith v. Robertson, 59 N. Y. 558.

But it is urged by appellant that these cases are not in point, because in neither of the States in which the decisions were made was there a Statute similar to section 1561 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that when "authority is given in the will to sell property, the executor may sell any property of the estate without order of the court, and at either public or private sale, and with or without notice, as the executor may determine," but that "no title passes unless the sale be confirmed by the court." And it is claimed that the sale here, having been confirmed by the court, is valid under that section. But we think it is manifest that in determining the question whether, in judgment of law, authority to sell has in fact been given to an executor, the section can have no application. It is equally clear that the authority to sell therein referred to must be held to include only such a one as is operative and binding upon the person against whom it is asserted; and unless such an authority can be found in the will, when such will is read and construed with reference to the law which determines its meaning and legal effect, it must be held that it does not exist; and in that case there is nothing upon which this section of the Code can act.

The case of Coates v. Hughes, 3 Binn. 498, cited and relied on by appellants, is not in conflict with the views we have announced. The power under consideration there was confined to a sale for the payment of the debts of the testator, and it appeared that there was a necessity for the sale for such purpose, and the court held, and we think rightly, that such a power was operative. The reason why, in such a case, the power of sale would be operative, is apparent. The child who succeeds to the estate of his ancestor by inheritance takes it subject to the payment of the debts of such ancestor, and his right of succession is in no wise affected by a provision in a will which goes no further than to authorize what the law would in any event direct to be done, if necessary to discharge such lien. In such a case the executor is only clothed with the ordinary powers incident to the administration of the estate, in fact, the precise power which the law gives an administrator of the estate of an intestate. The order of confirmation imparted no validity to the sale in this case; it only adjudicates that the power contained in the will had been followed, and that the sale was for a fair price. We are satisfied with the conclusion reached in Department 1. Judgment affirmed.

We concur: Garoutte, J.; McFarland, J.; Sharpstein, J.; Paterson, J.

Harrison, J.:

I concur in the order affirming the judgment, both for the reasons expressed in the opinion of Mr. Justice De Haven, and also upon the following considerations: Section 1403 of the Civil Code provides that "upon the death of the husband one half of the community property goes to the surviving wife, and the other half . . . goes to his descendants, . . . subject to his debts, the family allowance and expenses of administration." These are the "purposes of administration" referred to in section 1884, Civil Code, and are also the objects for which the court is authorized under section 1536, Code Civil Proc., to direct a sale of the property of the decedent. The right of the children and the right of the surviving wife to the community property exist by virtue of the same section of the Code, and are declared in identical words, and, inasmuch as it is the settled rule that the right of the surviving wife to her half of the community property vests in her immediately upon the death of the husband (Silvey's Estate, 42 Cal. 210), it must also be held that the right of the children to their half of the same property vests in them at the same time.

In King v. Lagrange, 50 Cal. 328, it was held that a power of sale in the will did not authorize a conveyance by the executor of the wife's share of the community property, and that a conveyance by the executor, under such power, of the real estate of the deceased, did not have the effect to transfer the interest of the wife as the survivor of the community. It is true that the conveyance in that case was only of the "right, title and interest" of the decedent in the property, but the decision in the case does not turn upon this distinction, and in reality such a distinction does not exist. At the date of the conveyance, the testator, being dead, had, of course, no "right, title or interest" in the property; and the conveyance by the executor under the power contained in the will, being like a conveyance under any other power of attorney (Larco v. Casanueva, 30 Cal. 551), would necessarily be limited to such right, title and interest as existed in his constituent at the date of his death, the point of time when the authority of the executor came into existence. If a conveyance under a power of sale given in the will is inoperative to transfer the interest of the wife, it must be equally inoperative to transfer the interest of the children. In accordance with the principles established by the decision in King v. Lagrange, it is the usual, if not the invariable, custom of conveyancers in this State, when community property of a decedent is sold by the executor under a power given by the will, to require a release or conveyance of the same property from the surviving wife. This rule or custom was followed in the present case, since it appears from the record that the purchaser took a deed of the land in question from the surviving wife individually as well as in her representative capacity.

*1. A marriage occurring while section 1, chap. 109, Va. Code 1860, was in force, between persons, one of whom had a husband then living, is absolutely void, without decree. It conferred no right to alimony. Though the parties cohabited since the Code of 1868 took effect, and though a suit to declare the nullity of such marriage was brought under the Code of 1868, no alimony can be decreed therein to the woman.

APPEAL by plaintiff from so much of a decree of the Circuit Court for Monongalia County, annulling a marriage, as directed him to pay alimony to defendant. Reversed.

Mr. P. H. Keck for appellant.

Messrs. Berkshire & Sturgiss for appellee.

BRANNON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On May 4, 1848, Asbury Vandervort and Rebecca Jane McClaskey were married in Monongalia County, and in 1856 removed to the then far west, to Iowa, there living together until 1860, when one morning before day-break he arose from his bed, and abandoning his wife and only child, a daughter then about eight years of age, without intimation to either of them of any intention to desert them, went to Illinois, where he remained, moving to several different points, until September, 1888, when he returned to Monongalia County, in this State. In all the twenty-eight years from his desertion to August, 1888, there was no communication between him and his wife and child; no tidings whatever came to him of them, nor to them of him; their existence was as if blotted out to him, and his to them. His family, as his brother says, regarded him dead. She states that he had been sick for two years, had not worked any for two months, had taken a great deal of quinine for ague, and his mind was weak, but he was not a maniac; that the same week he left she heard he had gone towards the Mississippi River; that she wrote to Virginia to know if he had come here, but his friends had heard nothing of him; that she advertised for him in two or three papers. In 1864 the wife and child returned from Iowa to Monongalia County, and on October 1, 1867, after a few months courtship, she and William N. Stewart were married in Monongalia County. Stewart and she cohabited as man and wife until August, 1868. While she was absent visiting in a neighboring county a letter came from the first husband to Monongalia County to his brother, informing the latter that he would soon visit him; and when she reached the depot at Morgantown, on her return home, she was informed reliably of this fact, and advised not to return to Stewart's house; and she and Stewart never afterwards lived together. Early in September, 1868, the first husband appeared in Monongalia. It clearly appears that Stewart believed the first husband, Vandervort, dead when he married Mrs. Vandervort. He says that he stated to her before the marriage that he had heard some doubts expressed whether Vandervort was dead, and she replied that he was dead, and that he had taken quinine and lost his reason, had wandered away and was found dead on the prairie thirty or thirty-five miles away; that the body was badly decayed; that she did not go to see him, but the evidences from the hair and clothing was that of her husband; and that this statement allayed his fear. She says that she got a lady friend to tell him about her husband's death; that before the marriage he said to her that his brother had said there was a probability that her first husband might be living, and she then asked him if this lady had not told him the circumstance, and he said she had told him about the disappearance, and some clothes being found; and that she herself then told him that the clothes were found, and a man answering his description found dead in a cornfield twenty miles from where they lived; and that, still later, Stewart still mentioning the subject, she said to him, "Mr. Stewart, I have told you all I know about him, and if you are not satisfied, it is all right;" and he never mentioned it afterwards. It may be said that she might have had more definite information by tracing her husband up, or at least going to the place where the dead man spoken of by hearsay was. But he had been long gone without a syllable from him, and she living close to his kindred, and hearing nothing, it is probable that she believed him dead, and, acting on the legal presumption of death, from seven years' absence without information of his continued life, she married the second time under honest conviction of his death. When she married Stewart he had seven children aged from two months to thirteen years. She says she took charge of his household affairs and children, and discharged her duties faithfully as a wife for Stewart. She says: "I worked, I washed, churned, milked and cooked through the day. At night I would sit and sew, patch and darn till 12, 1 and 2 o'clock." Having doubt about his legal status, especially in view of the change in the law below spoken of, Stewart brought this suit to have a judicial sentence of the nullity of the second marriage, and a decree was rendered declaring its nullity, but requiring him to pay her $500 alimony; and to get relief from this alimony he appeals to this court.

To constitute a valid marriage, the parties must not only be willing to marry, but they must not labor under any legal disability. Prior marriage was not, at common law, a canonical disability rendering the contract merely voidable, but it was a civil or legal disability, rendering the second marriage void absolutely to all intents and purposes, being condemned by the New Testament (Matt. xix. 4-9; 1 Cor. vii. 4) and by the laws of most States. 1 Tucker, Bl. Com. 93; 1 Minor, Inst. 287; 1 Bishop, Mar. and Div. § 300. By the Statute Law in force when this second marriage was solemnized (Va. Code, ed. 1860, chap. 109, § 1), it was absolutely void, for it provided that all marriages prohibited by law on account of either of the parties having a former wife or husband then living should "be absolutely void, without any decree of divorce or other legal process." But though such a marriage is void without judicial sentence of its nullity, for obvious reasons such sentence is prudent and advisable, and the same Statute in section 4 gave either party right to sue to obtain such a decree. Then the question arises whether, in granting a decree of the nullity of such a marriage, alimony could be given the woman. Here it is very clear that, without authority of statute, alimony could not be decreed, for it never was a marriage,—the woman never was a wife. 2 Bishop, Mar. and Div. § 376; Schouler, Husb. and W. § 553.

Then is there any statute conferring power on a court to give alimony in such case? Suppose the suit brought before our Code of 1868. Section 12, chap. 109, Code 1860, provides that upon decreeing the dissolution of a marriage, and also upon decreeing a divorce, whether from the bond of matrimony or from bed and board, the court shall make such further decree as it shall deem expedient concerning the estate and maintenance of the parties or either of them. Now, this is not a suit for divorce from the bond of matrimony or from bed and board, under sections 6 and 7, for causes therein specified, but it is a suit to declare the nullity of the marriage under section 4; and therefore this case could not fall under those words of section 12, "and also upon decreeing a divorce, whether from the bond of matrimony or from bed and board;" and, if it falls under that section at all, it must be under the words, "upon decreeing the dissolution of a marriage."

Here we must recall the fact that this is no marriage. Literally, the expression, "upon decreeing the dissolution of marriage," would call for a marriage, not a nullity; for it is a contradiction in terms to talk about decreeing the dissolution of a marriage when that with which we are dealing is not the shadow of a marriage. But though, strictly speaking, this is so, the question occurred to me whether, for the purposes or within the meaning of the language, "upon decreeing the dissolution of a marriage," such a marriage could be regarded a marriage in the eye of this Code chapter, especially as it gives a suit to declare the nullity of a marriage, and then provides what may be done upon decree; in other words, would section 12, providing what courts might do as to maintenance upon decreeing, apply to all marriages as to which preceding sections allowed suit to be brought? What marriages do these words, "upon decreeing the dissolution of a marriage," relate to? Turning back to section 1, chap. 100, Code 1860, we find it providing for divers kinds of defective marriages, stamping some as void absolutely, others as void only from decree. It reads: "All marriages between a white person and a negro, and all marriages which are prohibited by law on account of either of the parties having a former wife or husband then living, shall be absolutely void, without any decree of divorce or other legal process. All marriages which are prohibited by law on account of consanguinity or affinity between the parties, all marriages solemnized when either of the parties was insane, or incapable from physical causes of entering into the marriage state, shall, if solemnized within this State, be void from the time they shall be so declared by a decree of divorce or nullity, or from the time of the conviction of the parties under the third section of the 198th chapter" (that is, for marrying relatives). Now, as this covers two classes of defective marriages, that is, those void and those voidable only by judicial sentence, I would apply the words, "upon decreeing the dissolution of a marriage . . . the court may make such further decree as shall seem expedient concerning the estate and maintenance of the parties," not to the marriages declared by the first section absolutely void without decree, which never for a moment were marriages, but to those declared void from the time of decree, which until such decree are valid. Under this section 1 are marriages defective because of what at common law were regarded as canonical disabilities, which both at common law and under this section would be voidable only, and also marriages void both at common law and under the section because of legal disabilities; and, though we may say the Statute makes all the impediments now legal, yet it preserves the distinction aforesaid prevailing between the effect of canonical and legal disabilities,—that is, between marriages void and voidable; and I do not think the Code of 1860 intended to confer on courts power to allow alimony where the marriage was absolutely void. Thus tested by the Code of 1860 in force when this second marriage occurred, I conclude that no alimony could be given her.

But some complication is infused into the case by the change of the Statute made by the West Virginia Code of 1868, for its section 1, chap. 64, makes none of these marriages absolutely void without decree, but makes all void only from decree. It reads as follows: "All marriages between a white person and a negro; all marriages which are prohibited by law on account of either of the parties having a former wife or husband then living; all marriages which are prohibited by law on account of consanguinity or affinity between the parties; all marriages solemnized when either of the parties was insane, or incapable from physical causes of entering into the marriage state, or under the age of consent,—shall, if solemnized in this State, be void from the time they are so declared by a decree of divorce or nullity."

In the Code of 1868, section 4 gives a suit for annulling a marriage, sections 5 and 6 suits for the two kinds of divorce and section 11 is just the same as section 12 in the Code of 1860 relative to decreeing maintenance; so that, though the first section of this chapter in the Code of 1868 makes all marriages void only from decree, it leaves the provision as to decreeing maintenance the same. It may thus be, though we are not called on to say, that on decreeing the nullity of such a marriage as this, solemnized since the 1st day of April, 1869, when the Code of 1868 took effect, alimony might be decreed, as it might be said that under the Code of 1868 such a marriage is not a vanity, but a marriage, until a decree of dissolution. But suppose this were so, does this marriage, dating before this great change in the law, fall under the new law? Can this amendment have the effect to convert a marriage void under the law in force when it occurred into a legal marriage, and impart to it the right of alimony which it did not then possess? Can the amendment retroact and bind the man by an obligation, a proprietary obligation, not imposed on him by the law then in force,—that is, to give alimony? This is a proprietary obligation, for it would lay upon his property the burden of alimony. In the first place, one of the cardinal rules by which courts are governed in interpreting statutes is that they must be construed as prospective in every instance, except where the intent that they shall act retrospectively is expressed in clear and unambiguous terms, or such intent is necessarily implied from the language of the Act, which would be inoperative otherwise than retrospectively. It is not enough that the language is general enough to cover past transactions to justify a retroactive construction. Every reasonable doubt is resolved against a retroactive operation of the Statute. Wade, Retroactive Laws, §§ 84, 85; Dual v. Malone, 14 Gratt. 24; 1 Bishop, Mar. and Div. §§ 98-108; Bishop, Stat. Cr. § 82.

"Words in a statute ought not to have a retrospective operation unless they are so clear, strong and imperative that no other meaning can be annexed to them, or unless the intention of the Legislature cannot be otherwise satisfied; and such is the settled doctrine of the court,"—is the language used twice, at least, by the United States Supreme Court as its rule in this matter. United States v. Beth, 7 U. S. 3 Cranch, 413, 2 L. ed. 483; Oswo Hong v. United States, 112 U. S. 559, 28 L. ed. 778.

This is a fundamental and salutary principle in the construction of statutes, and dates back to an ancient date in the English law, expressed in the rule and law of Parliament that nota constitutio futuris formam imponere debet non prateritis. 6 Bacon, Abr. 270; Bracton, lib. 4, fol. 2; 2 Minor, Inst. 292.

Lord Coke lays down the rule, and I think his rule is applicable in this case, that Acts of Parliament are to be so construed as that no man shall by literal interpretation be punished or endamaged. 2 Co. Litt. 860a.

Blackstone, in 1 Com. 46, says, that all laws are to commence in futuro, and operate prospectively. A notable early instance of this rule of construction was under the Statute which broadly declared that, "from and after the twenty-fourth of June, 1677, no action should be brought to charge any person upon any agreement made in consideration of marriage, . . . unless such agreement be in writing;" and it was held in the court of king's bench not to apply to promises before the Act. Helmore v. Shuter, 2 Show. 17 [Gillmore v. Shooter], 2 Mod. 810, 2 Lev. 227, 1 T. Jones, 106. As Kent, Ch. J., says, when we consider that this decision was as early as the reign of Charles II., we are impressed with the spirit of equity and independence of the English courts. This principle was taken from the civil law. See case of Dish v. Van Kleeck, 7 Johns. 477, and note, where full discussion of this doctrine will be found.

In Re Tuller, 79 Ill. 99, it is held that "generally all laws are to be construed as prospective, and not to prejudice or affect past transactions of the citizen." A statute declared that a marriage shall be deemed a revocation of a prior will, and it was argued that as the will did not take effect, and no rights vested under it, until testatrix's death, its validity depended on the statute as it was at her death; but the court said not. In Richmond v. Henry County Supra., 83 Va. 204, it is held that this rule applies to remedial statutes; and the quotation is made from Potter's Dwar. Stat., 164, note, that "even remedial statutes are to be deemed prospective in operation, and not to be applied to proceedings pending at the time of their enactment, unless a contrary intent appears."

In addition to this rule forbidding a retroactive operation to statutes by mere construction, it is to be noted that the Code of 1868 itself, which changed the law as above stated, in chapter 166, §§ 1, 2, provides that its adoption shall repeal all statutes of a general nature, but that their repeal shall not affect any act done, or any right established or accrued, before its adoption, save that proceedings thereafter had shall conform as nearly as practicable to the Code. I do not say that statutes merely regulating the conduct of legal proceedings in courts do not apply to past transactions, but when they touch the essential right of a party they cease to have that character. Here it is not a matter relating only to the remedy; it affects the right of the party essentially. See Potter's Dwar. Stat. 162, and note 9. Surely, under this rule, there is no call upon us to say that the new Statute makes that a marriage which till then was not, and imposes a pecuniary burden on the man charging his property not imposed on him by the law testing the transaction when it occurred. Were we, by plain language importing a retroactive intent in the Legislature, called on to give the Code of 1868 such effect, I should say that there was 1? L. R. A.

no power in the Legislature to enact such a statute affecting the personal rights of the citizen so seriously and gravely, by converting a union not matrimonial in legal aspect into a matrimonial relation, and imposing the burden of alimony where none was before, because it would in effect take one man's property, and give it to another, and violate that feature of our constitutional law which says that the citizen shall not be deprived of his property without due process of law. Statutes cannot validate deeds, wills and judicial proceedings, and thus divest vested rights of property from one and confer the same on another. Neither can they validate a marriage void in toto at the time when made, and thus impose the burden of alimony,—the burden of maintenance of a person as a wife who in law is no wife. See Wade, Retroactive Laws, § 156 et seq. "Every statute which takes away or impairs a vested right acquired under existing laws, or creates a new obligation, imposes a new duty, or attaches a new disability in respect of transactions or considerations already past, must be deemed retrospective in operation, and opposed to those principles of jurisprudence which have been universally recognized as sound." Broom, Legal Maxims, 68.

Hard as may be the fate of the defendant, after living and laboring with the plaintiff twenty-one years, to be turned out upon the world penniless, in old age, the plaintiff objects to paying this alimony, and this court has but to apply the law as it sees it, and reverse so much of the decree as requires the plaintiff to pay the defendant $500, and in all other respects affirm it.

NOTE.—Nuisance; annoyance by noise.

A man is entitled to the comfort and enjoyment of his dwelling-house, and if his neighbor makes such a noise in even the reasonable use of his property, in the pursuit of his trade or occupation, as to cause serious annoyance and disturbance, he may be restrained. Broder v. Saillard, L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 692.

If houses adjoining each other are so built that it is manifest that it was the intent that each adjoining inhabitant should enjoy his property for the ordinary purposes for which it was constructed, so long as it is so used, nothing can be so regarded in law as a nuisance; but if either party uses his house for an unusual purpose to the injury of his neighbor, it is not a reasonable use and his neighbor is entitled to protection. Ball v. Ray, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 471; Smith v. Phillips, 3 Phila. 11; Sparhawk v. Union Pass. R. Co. 54 Pa. 410.

effect must be the man of normal nervous sensibility and ordinary mode of living.

8. But such cases depend in a peculiar degree upon their own facts and surrounding circumstances; so that courts of equity should proceed with great caution in abating or restraining such factory by injunction, and not enjoin unless the fact of nuisance is made in some way to appear clearly beyond all ground of fair questioning.

A PPEAL by defendant from decrees of the Circuit Court for Wood County enjoining it from running its factory in such a manner as to produce loud and injurious noises, interfering with plaintiff's physical comfort and the enjoyment by him of his house, lot and premises. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Van Winkle & Ambler and J. A. Hutchinson for appellant.

Mr. Okey Johnson for appellee.

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court: In the year 1888, Barna Powell, plaintiff below, brought his bill in the Circuit Court of Wood County against Bentley & Gerwig Furniture Company, a partnership, defendants below and appellants, to perpetually enjoin and restrain said Company from the use of their furniture factory as a nuisance to plaintiff in the use and enjoyment of his lot and dwelling-house thereon. Defendants filed a demurrer, which was overruled; then answered, to which plaintiff replied generally. The depositions of thirty-eight witnesses were taken to be read on behalf of the plaintiff, and of twenty-seven witnesses to be read on behalf of defendants. On the 12th of August, 1890, the cause came on to be heard, when the circuit court pronounced a final decree, by which defendants were perpetually enjoined and restrained from so operating their furniture factory, machines, engines, etc., as to produce loud, disagreeable, annoying and injurious noises, interfering with the ordinary use, physical comfort and enjoyment by plaintiff, his family, and other occupants of his house, lot and premises; from which decree defendants have appealed. The proof shows that on the 6th of June, 1889, plaintiff brought against defendants an action of trespass on the case for damages for the nuisance asked to be enjoined, which action at law was pending in the same court, on the law side, when the decree complained of was pronounced.

History of common-law nuisance: The common-law doctrine of nuisance is as old as the common law itself. Our oldest law-writers treat of the subject. See citations from Glanvill and Bracton in Bigelow, Lead. Cas. Torts, 462.

Its foundation: It is founded on what we call the absolute rights of liberty and property. Each man has the right to that which he has made his own, and without control or diminution, save by the laws of the land. If each has it, all have it; so that it follows from this that each one must so use his property and rights as not to injure those of others. Each has his right for himself, and owes a corresponding duty to the other.

Definition: Some definitions are too broad to be useful; some too narrow to be true. The violation of this duty is the best general description of a nuisance.

Common nuisance: A common nuisance affects the people at large, and is an offense against the State, but an action may be brought in his own name by anyone who suffers damage peculiar in kind or degree beyond what is common to him and to others.

Private nuisance: A private nuisance affects one or more as private citizens, and not as a part of the public, and is ground for a civil suit only.

Subject matter: Generally it affects the use or enjoyment of real property, and, as we see by the old definitions, was confined to this; but modern law takes a wider range. It is closely related to the law of servitudes.

Statute law: Our statute law upon the subject relates to public nuisances, such as dams obstructing ordinary navigation or the passage of fish, etc. (W. Va. Code, chap. 44, p. 850); sale of intoxicating liquors (Id. § 18, chap. 32, p. 287); power of county court to abate nuisances (Id. § 25, chap. 89, p. 286); power of cities, towns and villages to abate (Id. § 28, chap. 47, p. 415); power of justices of the peace (Id. § 20c, chap. 150, p. 916).

Virginia and West Virginia cases on the subject: Our own cases on the subject are very few.

In Wingfield v. Crenshaw, 4 Hen. & M. 474 (Chancellor Taylor), it was held that a court of equity ought not to interpose in the case of a Whatever annoys such part of the public as necessarily comes in contact with it is a nuisance. Hackney v. State, 8 Ind. 494.

Noises produced in instruction in metal chasing by a school of decorative art in a neighborhood of closely built houses, affecting the comfort of the occupants, will be restrained as a nuisance. Ladies Dec. Art Club's App. (Pa.) 12 Cent. Rep. 877.

Where noise of music and shouting in a circus erected near a dwelling-house could be heard above the conversation in the dwelling-house, though windows and shutters were closed, it was held a nuisance which equity will restrain. Inchbald v. Robinson, L. R. 4 Ch. 388, 20 L. T. N. S. 259.

The noise of a steam engine may become, under some circumstances, a private nuisance. Davidson v. Itham, 9 N. J. Eq. 188. Compare Saltonstall v. Banker, 8 Gray, 196.

A nuisance may consist in attaching steam power to works already on the premises, causing such vibration and noise as to depreciate the value of adjoining premises. McKeon v. See, 4 Robt. 449.

The fact that noise and vibration from machinery have never been complained of for more than twenty years does not deprive a neighbor of his right to protection from increased noise. Heather v. Pardon, 37 L. T. N. S. 993.

No one can defend upon the ground that complainant's rightful alteration of his own property, or of its use, has made that a nuisance which was not before a nuisance. Sturges v. Bridgman, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 652.

The amount of annoyance which will constitute a nuisance, being a question of degree, depends upon the varying circumstances of each case. Columbus Gas Co. v. Freeland, 12 Ohio St. 382. See note to Bohan v. Port Jervis Gas Light Co. (N. Y.) 9 L. R. A. 711.

nuisance, except where the law would not afford an immediate nor an adequate remedy until irreparable injury might be done.

In Miller v. Trueheart, 4 Leigh, 569, plaintiff had secured judgment at law against owner of mill-dam which had been washed away, and which he was about to rebuild. It was held that the injunction should be granted unless it appears from the verdict of a jury, on an issue for that purpose, that the proposed expedient (to avoid the nuisance) would be effectual.

Amick v. Tharp, 18 Gratt. 564, relates to flooding back-water.

In Snyder v. Cabell, 29 W. Va. 48, a skating-rink was restrained as a nuisance. This case is much relied on by plaintiff.

Medford v. Levy, 31 W. Va. 649, holds that annoyances that in themselves would not amount to a private nuisance may become nuisances when done wantonly and maliciously; and I suppose the natural and ordinary use of property in so negligent a manner as to cause unnecessary harm and annoyance, not being reasonable, would be deemed a nuisance.

The old common-law remedies by action: These were two: (1) Quod permittat proster-nere. This was in the nature of a writ of right, and therefore subject to great delays. It commanded the defendant to permit the plaintiff to abate the nuisance, or show cause against the same; and plaintiff could have judgment to abate the nuisance, and for damages against the defendant. (2) An assize of nuisance, in which the sheriff was commanded to summon a jury to view the premises, and, if they found for the plaintiff, he had judgment to have the nuisance abated, and for damages. It is to be noticed that the jury were to view the premises. Both had long been out of use in Blackstone's day; with us they were never in use, as far as I know. The assize of nuisance lay only against the wrong-doer himself, but not against the alienee of the tenement wherein the nuisance was situated. This was the immediate reason for making that equitable provision in St. Westm. 2, 18 Edw I. chap. 24. This was in the year 1285 (8 Bl. Com. pp. 216, 222), and has been the occasion of our modern changes in common-law pleading. We see that in the assize of nuisance the jury were to view the premises; this may be done now in the case at law, at the request of either party. W. Va. Code, § 30, chap. 116, p. 760.

Modern remedies. The right to abate: This is treated of by Bracton, who wrote 628 years ago, and the remedy survives to the present time; but a party should not be advised to take the law into his own hands except in a case of great urgency, for he does so at his own risk, and at great hazard, should he be in the wrong, or go too far.

Things to be considered in determining what is a nuisance: Every man, as we have seen, has the exclusive dominion and the right to the full and exclusive enjoyment of his own property, to do with it as he pleases. His neighbor has the same right over his own property. Hence it follows, as the duty of each, to so use his own as not to injure that of the other, each one's duty qualifies his own right, and creates a corresponding right in the other.

Harm without legal injury: But this duty must be taken with qualifications, for, in the nature of things and of society, it is not reasonable that every annoyance should constitute an injury such as the law will remedy or prevent. One may therefore make a reasonable use of his right, though it may create some annoyance or inconvenience to his neighbor. But, even in such case, an annoyance lawful in itself may become unlawful when done maliciously.

Useful or necessary trades: So, also, public policy and general convenience require that on this head something more shall be conceded to useful and beneficial work than to useless and idle amusements, but where this line of difference is to be drawn can only be determined by the facts of each particular case.

Homes and factories: According to our settled notions and habits, there are convenient places,—one for the home, one for the factory; but, as often happens, the two must be so near each other as to cause some inconvenience. The law cannot take notice of such inconvenience, if slight or reasonable, all things considered, but applies the common-sense doctrine that the parties must give and take, live and let live; for here extreme rights are not enforceable rights,—at any rate, not by injunction. See Bishop, Non-Cont. Law, § 418, and cases cited.

Convenient place: But the term "convenient place" does not mean the one best for the profit and convenience of the owner of the offensive factory, but the one where it shall cause no actionable injury to others. One nuisance does not justify another; still it may be taken as one of the surrounding circumstances to be considered in determining whether or not the other be a nuisance.

Idiosyncracies of the person annoyed: In fixing the standard by which to measure what shall be deemed a nuisance in the given case, the nature of the man offended, as well as the nature of the thing offending, must be considered. Daniel Boone, Kentucky's famous pioneer, represented the County of Kanawha in the Virginia Legislature about 100 years ago, and soon after left the county, in part, it is said, because the throng of incomers had become annoying. Some families, it is said, think of re-establishing their old homes on lower Broadway. Leaving these matters for local history, past and to come, to look after, we know that our people, in a steadily increasing ratio, are crowding into the centers of population, seeking the conveniences, comforts and amenities of town life, notwithstanding its noise and bustle and other annoyances. For such standard it will not do to take the man, who, by reason of his sensitive nature, inborn or acquired, or by reason of his habits or mode of living, is supersensitive to the annoyance complained of; nor, on the other hand, are we to take one who, by nature or habit, is abnormally insensible to such things. The idiosyncracies or peculiar habits or modes of living of neither class furnish the proper test: and this, not because the over-sensitive man or man in ill health has less right, but because it is impossible in practice for the law to extend to him exceptional immunity or protection. Therefore we must take as our standard the normal man: the one of ordinary sensibility; of ordinary habits of living; the plain, well-to-do people, who make up the great mass of our busy world. If this should lead to hardship in particular cases, such as sickness, practical convenience makes it impossible to have any other criterion. In such cases we must appeal to the humanity and good will of our neighbor, rather than to any supposed enforceable right of our own.

So far the subject has been discussed on grounds common to a suit at law for damages, and a suit in equity to forbid, abate or restrain. But these remedies differ not less in the mode of relief than in effectiveness and in other important particulars. In the suit at law for damages, if the case is made out, damages, according to the injury proven, are awarded as matter of right, and not of discretion. But often this is only a half-way remedy, leading sometimes to endless litigation and to irreparable mischief. So that the remedy by injunction is sometimes the only one at all effective or complete, forbidding, preventing, stopping, abating the nuisance, exercising such restraint, and no more, as the exigencies of the particular case demand. And now, since the powers of man over the elements and forces of nature have become and are becoming so great and so far-reaching, this remedy grows in frequency and indispensability. Yet by reason in part of its very completeness and effectiveness, it is exercised, especially in cases like this, with great caution, and only after the fact of nuisance has been put beyond all ground for fair questioning. For although a court of equity in such cases follows precedent, and goes by rule, as far as it can, yet it follows its own rules,—and among them is the one that to abate or restrain in case of nuisance is not a matter of strict right, but of orderly and reasonable discretion, according to the right of the particular case,—and hence will refuse relief, and send the party to a court of law, when damages would be a fairer approximation to common justice, because to silence a useful and costly factory is often a matter of serious moment to the State and town, as well as to the owner. The matter here complained of as a nuisance is the noise of a furniture factory at the corner of Sixth and Ann Streets, causing personal annoyance to plaintiff and his family at his home opposite, across Ann Street, 80 feet from the factory, and thus indirectly impairing the value of his property. In such cases the question is, in its very nature, one of degree, and the evidence by which to determine it is matter of opinion, based on experience and observation of the thing itself. The rule to guide us in such cases is that the noise must be such as materially to interfere with and impair the ordinary comfort of existence on the part of ordinary people. Snyder v. Cabell, 29 W. Va. 48; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 817, 27 L. ed. 739. See also St. Helens Smelting Co. v. Tipping, 11 H. L. Cas. 642; Walter v. Selfe, 4 De Gex & S. 815; Crump v. Lambert, L. R. 8 Eq. 409; Gaunt v. Fynney, L. R. 8 Ch. 8; and the recent cases, Bohan v. Port Jervis Gas-Light Co. 122 N. Y. 18, 9 L. R. A. 711; and, on public nuisance, People v. Detroit White Lead Works (Mich.) 46 N. W. Rep. 735; Wiley v. Elwood (Ill.) 25 N. E. Rep. 570; and notes in Bohan v. Port Jervis Gas Light Co. supra.

record are taken up with the testimony of sixty-five witnesses—thirty-eight for plaintiff, twenty-seven for defendants—on the question of nuisance or no nuisance, with about 3,400 questions asked and answered. It is not unusual to observe or to fix some limit in the number of witnesses to be examined on such questions. In the view we take of this case it would answer no useful purpose to go into the evidence in detail. We can best express our view by comparing the facts of this case with the facts in the case of Snyder v. Cabell, 29 W. Va. 48, as that case is relied on and made the subject of extended comment by both sides. In that case the thing complained of as a nuisance was in the main noise, as it is here. There it was the noise of a skating rink, an unnecessary amusement; here the noise of a furniture factory, a trade of public utility, as well as of private benefit, costing more than $30,000, and employing more than sixty people. That was located in a part of the town therefore devoted for the most part to residences; here it was on a street occupied overhead by the approach of the Baltimore & Ohio Railway to its bridge across the Ohio at Parkersburg, devoted to the noises of running trains, already paid for to be used for that purpose, and for that reason not generally highly valued as a place for homes. The factory was well equipped and well conducted, with as little of the noise and hum of machinery as could be had in such a work, the noise stopping at six in the evening and not starting again until seven in the morning. In the rink the noise disturbed rest and sleep, continuing far into the night. The three families complaining of the noise of the rink, we may infer, were people of normal nervous sensibility to noise. Here the plaintiff and his principal witnesses, living near the factory, seem to be, by reason of ill health or by nature, rather supersensitive to such things. On the question of nuisance, the evidence is conflicting; at any rate the plaintiff does not put his case high and dry, above all ground of fair questioning. There is enough, perhaps, for the chancellor to have directed an issue. But this issue, the plaintiff by his suit at law has already brought on and made up. Under such a conflict of evidence, the suit at law should have been tried first. The finding on such a question of fact of twelve good and lawful men, who, if deemed proper, may see and hear the thing for themselves, is still greatly relied on by the court. By such course we would avoid the possibility or likelihood of the awkward predicament that now confronts us, of a court of equity having silenced as a nuisance a factory of great cost and of general utility, which the jury in the suit at law should afterwards find to be, all things considered, no nuisance at all. Besides, if the jury should find it to be a nuisance by giving substantial damages, the chancellor would then have safer ground for his decree.

The decrees of the 12th and 14th August, 1890, must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded, the further hearing to abide the determination of the issue of nuisance or no nuisance in the suit at law, or to be demurred to by plaintiff, according as he may be advised.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

Benjamin H. CHILD, Chief of Police,

Frederick BEMUS.

(.....R. L.....)

1. Conferring upon the mayor power to revoke hackmen's licenses does not exceed the authority given to a city council "to make laws, ordinances and regulations relative to hackney carriages."
2. A vested right cannot be acquired in a license granted under an ordinance that gives or reserves the power to revoke it.
3. The power to revoke licenses in his discretion, conferred on the mayor by the common council of a city, is not unreasonable or oppressive, though it may be exercised without his giving notice to the licensee.

(February 7, 1891.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Court of Common Pleas for Providence County made during the trial of a proceeding against defendant for driving a hackney carriage without a license, which resulted in a conviction and sentence imposing a fine. Overruled.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. Charles E. Gorman for defendant. Messrs. Nicholas Van Slyck, City Solicitor, and Cyrus M. Van Slyck, Asst. City Solicitor, for plaintiff:

Durfee, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a complaint against the defendant for driving a hackney carriage without a license, in violation of an ordinance of the City of Providence. On trial thereof in the court of common pleas, on appeal from the police court, it appeared that July, A. D. 1890, a license was granted to the defendant for one year, and that September 16, A. D. 1890, it was revoked by the mayor on recommendation of the superintendent of hacks, representing that the defendant had refused to remove his carriage at the Boston depot when told to do so by the officer there. It was revoked without notice or hearing. The evidence in support of the complaint showed that the defendant was driving for hire September 22, A. D. 1890. The defense was that the revocation was void. The jury, under rulings by the court sustaining its validity, found the defendant guilty. The cause is before us on exceptions to said rulings. Power is given to the city council of the City of Providence by the city charter "to make laws, ordinances and regulations relative to . . . hackney carriages, trucks, carts and other vehicles, and licensing and regulating the same." Under this provision the city council passed an ordinance, forbidding any person to drive a hackney carriage in the city without license from the mayor and board of aldermen under penalty of a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $20, making the licenses grantable by the mayor and aldermen, in their discretion, and giving the mayor power to revoke any license so granted.

The defendant's first point is that the city council, in conferring upon the mayor power to revoke, exceeded their authority under the charter. The authority given by the charter is expressed in broad terms. It is to make laws, ordinances and regulations relative to hackney carriages and licensing them. The language seems to us to be broad enough to authorize, not only the granting of licenses, but also the granting of them subject to a power of revocation; and we see no reason why such power may not be vested by ordinance in the mayor. It is argued that the licensee has a vested right in his license beyond the city council's power to forfeit. Assuming that this would be so if the power to revoke were not reserved, it seems to us that when, as here, the license is granted under an ordinance that gives or reserves the power, it is to be regarded as subject to the power, and terminable by its exercise. The license is in the nature of a privilege to perform a public service or function, for reward, which service or function, for the public good, and to secure its orderly and efficient performance, must be subjected to certain regulations. These regulations must be obeyed; and therefore the power to revoke the license is highly important, since the licensee may be not only disobedient, but obdurate or incorrigible. The cases cited for the defendant to show that a town or city cannot enforce its by-laws or ordinances by forfeitures of property where it is empowered to enforce them by fines, do not seem to us to be in point.

In State v. Town Council of Columbia, 6 Rich. L. 404, which at first view appears as if it might be so, it was decided that the town council had no power to subject a liquor license, granted by them, to forfeiture for breach thereof; but there the license was granted by the town council, acting under a statute of the State prescribing conditions and restrictions, and the court held that, the Legislature having prescribed them, the town council could not add to them. The case differs from this, for here the whole matter of licensing is left unrestrictedly to the city council.

The defendant contends that the city council, if it was authorized to confer the power, was not authorized to confer it to be exercised without first giving notice to the licensee, and allowing him an opportunity to be heard. We are free to say that an exercise after notice and hearing would better suit our notions of proper procedure than an exercise without them. The ordinance prescribes no procedure, but leaves the matter wholly to the mayor's discretion. Is the ordinance, on this account, so unreasonable or oppressive that it is void? The complainant cites Com. v. Kinsley, 138 Mass. 578. In that case it was decided that a Statute authorizing the selectmen in towns to grant licenses to keep tables for playing pool for hire, and providing that "such licenses may be revoked at the pleasure of the authority granting it," is constitutional. The license was revoked there without notice. "A licensee," say the courts, "takes his license subject to such conditions as the Legislature sees fit to impose; and one of the statutory conditions of this license was that it might be revoked by the selectmen at their pleasure." The question of reasonableness did not arise, since a statute, if constitutional, is valid, whether reasonable or not. The reasonableness of an ordinance, even, it has been held, cannot be inquired into by the court if specifically authorized by the Legislature. In the case at bar we may inquire, the authority being general. But such an inquiry is a nice one, especially if it regards policy, rather than principle; and it seems to us that the court in making it should take care not to be influenced too much by its own judicial usages or predilections. Here especially it is to be remembered that the power was given for administrative, not judicial, purposes. While the mayor may revoke a license under the power, if it be valid, without notifying or hearing the licensee, there is, on the other hand, nothing to prevent his giving a hearing first, if he sees fit; and the question is whether it is reasonable for him to be intrusted with such a discretion.

It appears from Com. v. Kinsley, supra, that the Legislature of Massachusetts considered the conferring of such a power not unreasonable; for otherwise, presumably, they would not have conferred it. The matter there was of no more urgency than the matter here. The reasons would be stronger here against the power if the licensee were required to pay heavily for his license, but he has to pay only a dollar's fee for it; and, if a license has been revoked unduly, there is nothing to prevent the board of aldermen from righting the wrong by granting a new one. We have come to the conclusion, after much consideration, that it is not sufficiently plain that the power, or the clause of the ordinance that grants the power, is unreasonable or oppressive, to make it our duty to declare it void.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

John CROUSE et al.

v.

Daniel MURPHY and Charles Roggenmoser, Terro-tenant and App't.

(....Pa....)

The record of a judgment against Daniel Murphy is not notice of the judgment to one who takes a conveyance of lands from the judgment debtor whose name appeared in the title deeds as Daniel J. Murphy.

A PPEAL by Roggenmoser from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for Philadelphia County in favor of plaintiffs in a scire facias proceeding to revive a judgment against Murphy so as to make it a lien on property which had been conveyed by Murphy to appellant. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. B. Colahan, Jr., and John H. Johnson for appellant.

Messrs. Henry T. Dechert and Henry M. Dechert for appellees.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The intention to protect an innocent purchaser against secret liens and conveyances manifested itself very early in this State. An Act of the Colonial Legislature passed in 1772 made it the duty of "any judge or other officer of a court of record within this province, that shall sign any judgments," to enter the date of signing on the margin of the record, and declared that the lien of the judgment thereafter begin at that date, instead of extending, by relation, to the first day of the term on the return of the original writ. Three years later it was made the duty of purchasers to record their deeds within six months, and, if they failed to do so, their unrecorded deeds were to be held fraudulent and void as against subsequent bona fide purchasers and mortgagees. Prior to 1775 there was no duty to record resting on purchasers, and one buying land was bound to investigate the title at his peril. Macley v. Work, 5 Binn. 154.

In 1798 the duration of the lien of a judgment upon the defendant's land was limited to five years, unless duly revived. The Act of 1849 made it the duty of the plaintiff to take notice of a sale of land by his debtor, and provided that, as to a purchaser, the lien of the judgment should be discharged, unless such purchaser was named by scire facias within five years after he placed his deed upon the record, notwithstanding the judgment may have been regularly revived against the defendant. To facilitate searches, separate judgment dockets were provided for in 1827, and our present system of lien dockets, as judgment indexes, was adopted in 1856. The Act provided "that the lien of a judgment shall not commence or be continued against any purchaser or mortgagee unless the same be entered in the county where the real estate is situated, in a book to be called the 'Judgment Index,' . . . and the plaintiff shall furnish the proper information to enable the prothonotary to prepare said entry." Among other things, the entry must show the names of the parties against whom a lien is entered. The purchaser

NOTE.—Notice by judgment entry.

An entry of a judgment in the "Index of All Liens," as against "J. H. Hesse," is not constructive notice of a judgment against "J. H. Hesser," Etna L. Ins. Co. v. Hesser (Iowa) 4 L. R. A. 122.

But where writ, pleadings and contract speak only of Frederick D. Conrad, but the judgment is for the plaintiff against "Daniel Frederick Conrad, the defendant," the defect is cured by the Statute of Jeofails. Conrad v. Griffey, 52 U. S. 11 How. 480, 13 L. ed. 779.

is bound to take notice of liens appearing on the judgment index, but he is not bound to look beyond it, and, if his search discloses the existence of no lien entered there against his vendor, he may complete the transaction, and pay over the purchase money in safety. Upon this general proposition there is no difference of opinion. The question presented is, Through what modifications must one who proposes to become a purchaser pursue the name of his vendor?

In the case now before us one Daniel J. Murphy owned a lot of land at the corner of Myrtle and Holly Streets, in the City of Philadelphia. His deed for the same was regularly recorded, as was a mortgage given by him for part of the purchase money. He took and he incumbered the title in his proper name as Daniel J. Murphy. Roggenmoser desired to buy the lot. He found the title properly recorded, and incumbered by a mortgage. Turning from the recorder's office to that of the prothonotary, he caused search to be made for liens on the judgment index against Daniel J. Murphy, and found none. He then completed his purchase, settled the purchase price and received and recorded his deed. This was in 1888. In June of that year Murphy went to Chicago to reside. In 1889 the plaintiff, who had a judgment against Daniel Murphy, issued his writ of sci. fa., and served Roggenmoser as terre-tenant.

Was the judgment against Daniel Murphy a lien on the lot? It is admitted that Daniel Murphy and Daniel J. Murphy are the same person. It is clear, therefore, that real estate in the hands of that person would be bound. Having signed his name in the form in which it appears on the judgment index, he could not object to the enforcement of the judgment against his property. As between him and his creditor, it is a question of personal identity. But the defendant is not objecting. It is a purchaser who bought after a search of the records, and with no actual notice of the existence of this judgment, who claims protection. If he did all the law required of him, he is entitled to protection against the judgment of the plaintiff. If he did not, then he must suffer for his want of care in making the search. The plaintiff contends that he was bound to take notice of this judgment, because it was a lien against his vendor, and could have been enforced against the land in his hands. It appears in the case stated that Murphy, in the transaction of his business, used his name in various forms. On his note it was D. Murphy. He gave some notes as Dan Murphy, some as Daniel Murphy, and it is clear that he took and conveyed title as Daniel J. Murphy. In the city directory it appeared, at and for years before the sale to Roggenmoser, as Daniel J. Murphy. If a judgment had been entered on a note signed "Dan Murphy," and on another signed "D. Murphy," there is no reason that can be urged in support of the lien now before us that could not, with equal force, be urged in support of the lien of both the others. All were signed by the same man and were for debts due by him. If the creditor has no duty resting on him, but is to be protected because Daniel J. Murphy was his debtor in fact, notwithstanding he did not put his name correctly to the note, then all the forms of the name used in signing the notes stand on the same ground. In order to see the practical operation of such a holding, we have looked into the city directory, and find the name of Daniel Murphy, with various middle letters and without any, occurs twenty times. But "D" is the initial of David, Dennis and many other first names besides Daniel. To exhaust the possibilities as to D. Murphy would require searches running into the hundreds. But without laying too much stress on the argument ab inconvenienti, or the apparent legislative intent, let us glance at our cases bearing upon this question. In several cases, among which are Ridgway's App., 15 Pa. 177; York Bank's App., 36 Pa. 458, and Smith's App., 47 Pa. 128,—it has been held that a lien entered in the last name of the defendant is not a lien on the real estate of the defendant in the hands of bona fide purchasers. For example, a lien entered against the firm of McFall & Martin does not bind the separate real estate of the partners in the hands of purchasers because of the absence of the first names of McFall and of Martin. Not only must the first name appear, but it must be correct; for in Zimmerman v. Briggans, 5 Watts, 186, the judgment was entered on a bond. The bond was signed, "Jacob Briggans," which was the true name of the obligor. The prothonotary made a mistake, and entered the name in the lien docket as John Briggans. An examination of the files would have shown the mistake, but this court held that subsequent creditors were not bound to go beyond the lien docket, and postponed the judgment, because of the mistake in the first name.

It is not enough that names are idem sonans. In Hall's App., 40 Pa. 458, the true name of the defendant was George P. Yoest. It was entered on the index against George P. Joest. The first name was right. The last name was idem sonans with the right name of the defendant, but it was held that the purchaser had no notice of the lien from the record. The reason evidently is that the record addresses itself to the eye, and not to the ear alone. The purchaser was bound to look under the letter "Y," which was the initial letter of his vendor's name. Not finding a lien there, he was not bound to go further, and the lien was postponed. But in Wood v. Reynolds, 7 Watts & S. 406, our precise question was decided. A note was signed by John M. Grurer. By some oversight of the prothonotary the "M" was omitted, and the lien entered against John Grurer. A purchaser from John M. Grurer made search for liens against his vendor, but found none, and completed his purchase. We held that he had done all that was required of him, and that the judgment could not be enforced against the land in his hands. This case was followed in Hutchinson's App., 92 Pa. 186, and the rule distinctly laid down that "the omission of the middle letter in a name on the judgment index is fatal to a lien" as against bona fide purchasers.

From this review of the case it will be seen that the rule was well settled in this State when the case of Jenny v. Zehnder, 101 Pa. 296, came before this court. In that case a different rule was adopted, which is wholly inconsistent with Wood v. Reynolds and Hutchinson's App. and Myer v. Fogaly, 39 Pa. 429, cited as authority for it. An examination of the latter case will show that it does not sustain the rule laid down in Jenny v. Zehnder, nor afford it any aid whatever. The case was this: One John Bubb executed a judgment note. The prothonotary of Lancaster County entered judgment upon it against John Bobb. This judgment was held to be notice because the two names are identical. They are different modes of spelling the same name, and, as was said by the court, are idem sonans, at least in the German counties, of which Lancaster is one. The name was found under the proper title in the index, with the correct first name, and with a variation in spelling in the middle letter which made no change in the name as spoken. Similar instances are the names of Kopp and Kupf, and of Kolp and Kulp, which are merely different forms of the same name, with the same initial and the same pronunciation. It is to be regretted that Wood v. Reynolds and Hutchinson's App. had not been considered in Jenny v. Zehnder. The learned judge of the court below followed the last case faithfully, but we feel constrained to say what he could not, that we prefer and shall follow the old and well-settled line of cases to which we have referred. The rule of Wood v. Reynolds is not only most in harmony with the spirit of our legislation, and with our own decided cases, but it is equitable in its operations. Murphy's title was on the record. Whoever dealt with him on the credit of his real estate was bound to know what appeared in his recorded title. It was as much the duty of one who was about to trust him with money or goods because of his ownership of land to know how and by what name he held it, as it was the duty of one about to purchase the land to make the same inquiries. If the creditor neglected his duty, he must lose in consequence. If the purchaser neglected his, he must lose. Because the creditor in this case did neglect to examine the record, he has a note signed with only part of the maker's name on which judgment has been entered. With no notice of the habit of his vendor to sign notes in several different ways, and with no means of notice of liens but the record, the purchaser examined, exhausted the means of knowledge within his reach, and, finding no lien against Daniel J. Murphy, or D. J. Murphy, settled with his vendor, and took his deed. If one of these parties must lose, in good conscience it should be he whose neglect to avail himself of the information which the record could have given him made the loss by one or the other inevitable.

The judgment is reversed, and judgment is now entered in favor of the defendant upon the case stated.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Dwight B. BAKER et al., Appts.,

v.

Charles HART et al., Respts.

(.....N. Y. ....)

1. A lease giving the sole and exclusive right to quarry stone on certain lands for a term of years does not transfer the land, or make the lessees owners of any stone which they do not actually quarry out and sever from the land, or entitle them to recover as owners for the conversion of stone quarried and taken away by trespassers, although they are entitled to the damages sustained by invasion of their exclusive right.
2. Lessees, having a right merely to quarry stone on the premises which is a mere incorporeal hereditament, are under no implied obligation to protect the premises from trespassers, and are therefore not entitled on that ground to recover as owners for the conversion of the stone by trespassers.
3. The measure of damages for quarrying and carrying away stone by trespassers in a suit by lessees merely of the exclusive right to quarry the stone does not extend to the full value of the stone, but merely to the damages actually occasioned by the invasion of such exclusive right; in such case nominal damages at least should be granted.

the Rockland Circuit in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for the conversion of certain granite blocks. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Jesse Johnson, of Messrs. Johnson & Lamb, for appellants:

The lease did not give title; it merely gave a right to acquire title by quarrying and cutting; it gave what the books designate an incorporeal hereditament.

Grubb v. Bayard, 2 Wall. Jr. 81; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 4th ed. p. 376; Doe v. Wood, 2 Barn. & Ald. 724; Clement v. Youngman, 40 Pa. 341; Bainbridge, Mines, *266; Shep. Touch. 96.

If the trespass of the defendants was accidental, inadvertent or anything less than the deliberate purpose to appropriate the property of another, the plaintiffs have no right to the value added by the labor of the defendants and the transportation of carloads of heavy granite from a mountain quarry to the City of New York.

Mr. C. P. Hoffman, with Mr. Alexander B. Butts, for respondents:

The plaintiffs' title was based upon their lease, which "let" and "granted" to them the possession and the sole and exclusive right to enter into and upon the demised premises, and to cut, quarry and take away stone therefrom during the entire term of the lease.

This possession and these rights were wrongfully and unlawfully invaded by the defendants.

Under these circumstances the plaintiffs' right to bring and maintain this action was perfect.

Austin v. Hudson River R. Co. 25 N. Y. 340.

These acts of the defendants subjected the plaintiffs to an action for waste at the suit of the plaintiffs' lessor.

Ibid.; Cook v. Champlain Transp. Co. 1 Denio, 91, and cases cited.

It was proper to allow the plaintiffs to show the value of the stone after the defendants had taken them from the quarry and had taken them to the Harlem Bridge.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint in this action alleged that the plaintiffs were the lessees of a lot of land containing twenty-five acres; that under said lease they had the sole and exclusive right of entering upon the leased lands for the purpose of quarrying, cutting, crushing and removing stone therefrom; that defendants wrongfully entered upon the premises and quarried stone belonging to the plaintiffs, and had converted the same to their own use; and that the plaintiffs had thereby suffered damage which they claimed to recover. Upon the trial the plaintiffs produced their lease from the owner of the land. It gave to them "the sole and exclusive right of entering in and upon the lands for the purpose of quarrying, cutting, crushing and removing stone for the term of ten years, . . . but not to hold possession of any part of said lands for any other purposes." Other provisions were in accord with the right conveyed and limited, and bounded the plaintiffs' use. The lease, therefore, did not transfer the land, but gave to the plaintiffs an incorporeal hereditament, a right to take stone from the land, which became theirs only upon its actual severance. What they should quarry and remove within the restricted term became theirs, but what they did not quarry out and sever from the land remained the property of the owner of the fee. Grubb v. Bayard, 2 Wall. Jr. 81; Doe v. Wood, 2 Barn. & Ald. 724; Olement v. Youngman, 40 Pa. 841; Caldwell v. Fulton, 81 Pa. 480; Arnold v. Stevens, 24 Pick. 106.

A right to take all the stone on the land without restriction in time or quantity might readily be held to transfer its ownership, but I have found no case which asserts such entire and complete title in the lessee where there was merely a right to mine or quarry restricted and limited by time or quantity. In such a case all of the stone on the premises does not pass to the lessee, but only such and so much as, within the boundaries of his right, he cuts and quarries. The defendants were of course trespassers. They entered upon the premises without right, and cut and carried away a quantity of stone. The plaintiffs, under objection, were allowed to prove the value of the stone, and to recover that value on the theory that they owned it. But they did not. Their lease gave them no title to it. They did not cut or quarry it, and the ownership remained in their lessor. Undoubtedly the act of the defendants was an infringement of their rights for which they could recover such damages as they in fact sustained. But they proved none. If the limits of their lease would have exhausted all the stone on the twenty-five acres, then certainly they would have lost the value of what was wrongfully removed; but if the supply was such that there remained for them all and more than they could quarry or remove, they at least lost no stone which they were entitled to have, for enough remained to fully satisfy their entire right. The injury in such case would fall upon the lessor whose property had been taken.

It may be that the lessees were in some manner or to some extent injured by the trespass of the defendants, although stone enough remained to satisfy the exigency of their contract. We do not know how that may be, in the absence of proof, and therefore may prudently refrain from any suggestions about it. It is enough for present purposes that the plaintiffs established no ownership of the stone, and no right to recover its value as owners, and so the judgment rendered was erroneous.

But it is sought to be sustained on another theory. The doctrine is invoked that a tenant for life or years is bound to answer to the owner for any waste committed, even though it be the act of a stranger. Such is undoubtedly the rule. Cook v. Champlain Transp. Co. 1 Denio, 91, 104. But it applies to the case of a tenancy. It proceeds upon the ground that the leased premises have passed into the possession of the tenant, so that an entry, unless under some special reservation, by the lessor himself would be a trespass. The latter cannot protect the premises, because for the time being he has parted with the possession, and intrusted it to the lessee, and the latter, having become the custodian and possessor of the land, comes under an implied obligation not to commit waste upon it, and not permit others to do so. But the rule and its reason are alike inapplicable where not an estate but a mere incorporeal hereditament is transferred. Here the owner remained in possession, and conveyed, not his land, but an easement in it, and could protect his own possession against trespassers like the defendant. The plaintiffs covenanted to conduct their operations in a workmanlike manner, and without needless waste or injury, and so became liable for their own acts; but beyond this they incurred no implied obligation to protect the premises from trespassers, and were in no manner made its guardians. The lessor remained in possession, and had as clear a right to sue the defendants for their trespass as if he had never given an easement to the plaintiffs. And so I discover no ground upon which the plaintiffs can be deemed owners of the stone, and therefore entitled to its value. Their exclusive right has been invaded, and if thereby they have suffered substantial damage, they must establish it by their proof. If they can show none, they may at least be entitled to nominal damages in vindication of their right.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, costs to abide the event.
All concur.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

Daniel P. MORSE, Appt.,

v.

HACKENSACK SAVINGS BANK, Respnt.

(.....N. J. Eq.....)

1. A sheriff's deed on the sale of lands under an execution takes effect as an actual conveyance from the date of the sale, and not from the date of the execution and delivery of the deed.
2. Where the will contains no devise of lands, but the testator has disposed of his entire estate by means of a power to sell and divide the proceeds of sale, the lands descend to his heir-at-law subject to the power of sale and the trusts declared thereon contained in the will.
3. The estate of the heir-at-law intermediate the testator's death and the exercise of the power of sale is an actual estate, which is alienable, devisable and descendible, and liable to seizure and sale as lands; but, when the power of sale is executed, the estate of the heir or his alienee is determined, and the purchaser under the power becomes seised under the devise by a title paramount to the title of the heir by descent.
4. Where a testator by his will directs the sale of his lands, and the division of the proceeds among his heirs-at-law, the latter may dispense with the sale, and elect to take the lands in lieu of the proceeds of sale.
5. The principle on which the doctrine of election rests is the identity of the interest the heirs take as heirs-at-law, and in the proceeds of the conversion. When the testator charges his estate, real and personal, with the payment of his debts, and directs his executors to sell his real and personal estate, and divide the proceeds between his two children, the latter cannot elect to take the lands as heirs-at-law, and by such election impair or defeat the rights of testator's creditors.
6. A direction that the executor pay the debts of the testator out of his real or personal estate is a charge of debts upon lands creating a trust which creditors can enforce by compelling the executor to execute the trust.
7. No limitation of time is imposed upon a power in the nature of a trust, not limited in terms, unless the rule against perpetuities is involved, or the power is controlled by an inherent quality in the nature of the trust, or in the object for which the power was granted.
8. There may be circumstances and conditions under which the default of creditors in not requiring the execution of a power of sale in their favor may amount to laches, which a court of equity will lay hold of as proof of fraud; but in such cases the ground of relief is fraud in knowingly permitting a power of sale to be kept outstanding as a standing menace, with the intent to protect trust property from the creditors of the person ultimately entitled.

APPEAL by defendant, Morse, from a decree of the Chancery Court in favor of complainant in a suit brought to quiet plaintiff's alleged title to certain real estate, and to set aside a deed held by Morse, which was alleged to be a cloud on such title. Reversed.

Peter R. Terhune died seised of the land in controversy. Morse purchased the same at a sale made by the executor under a power given by Terhune's will. The Savings Bank derived its title through a sheriff's sale of the land under an execution against one Richard P. Terhune, an heir-at-law of the testator.

The further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. John Linn for appellant.

Mr. Charles H. Voorhis, for respondent:

The will contained no direction to sell, and no devise of the lands; but a naked power of sale and a bequest of the proceeds equally to testator's two heirs-at-law. Hence the lands descended to R. P. Terhune and his sister, subject to be devested by execution of the power of sale.

Such power of sale can be defeated by election of the legatees, who are also the heirs-at-law.

Depue, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Peter R. Terhune died in January, 1879, seised of certain real estate in the County of Bergen. By his will, executed January 2, 1878, he provided as follows: "I order and direct my executor, hereinafter named, to pay all my just debts, funeral and testamentary charges, as soon as can be after my decease, out of my real or personal estate. I give and bequeath unto my wife, Mary Ann, the sum of five hundred dollars, to be paid to her after my decease, and I do direct that said legacy shall be in lieu of my wife's dower in my estate; also an annuity of one hundred and fifty dollars a year, to be paid in half-yearly payments, as long as she remains my widow. I hereby authorize and empower my executor to sell and dispose of all my real and personal estate of which I may die seised, either at public or private sale, for such price as he shall deem proper, and give to the purchaser of the same a good, valid and absolute title thereto. I give, bequeath and devise all the proceeds of my real and personal estate in manner following; that is to say, after paying the above-described legacy and annuity, one half to my son, Richard Paul Terhune, and one half to my daughter, Margaret, the wife of Garrit G. Oldis." Richard P. Terhune, the executor named in the will, duly proved the will, and letters of probate were issued thereon, January 29, 1879. Richard P. Terhune, the executor, and his sister, Margaret Oldis, to whom the proceeds of the sale of the testator's real and personal property, after satisfaction of the charges thereon, were given, were the only children and heirs-at-law of the deceased. On the 3d of November, 1880, the Hackensack Savings Bank, the complainant, recovered a judgment against Richard P. Terhune for $3,450 damages, and $14.50 costs, and on the 11th of May, 1888, execution was issued upon the judgment, and put in the hands of the sheriff of Bergen, and executed by a levy on all the right, title and interest of Richard P. Terhune in one of the tracts of land of which the testator died seised. The sale having been duly advertised, the premises were set up and sold on the 29th of August, 1888, to the complainant, for the sum of $50. The sheriff's deed was not delivered until the 27th of September, 1888.

The date of the delivery of the sheriff's deed is a circumstance of no importance. A purchaser at a sheriff's sale acquires, by the act of purchase, a right to a conveyance of the premises in pursuance of the sale. The delivery by the officer of a deed is a mere ministerial act which the officer is required to perform to consummate the sale and vest in the purchaser a title in compliance with the law under which the sale was made. Walker v. Hill, 23 N. J. Eq. 514-580. The sheriff's deed, when delivered, has relation back to the time of the sale of which it is the consummation. Jacobus v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 27 N. J. Eq. 605-608.

At a public sale on the 22d of September, 12 L. R. A.

1888, Richard P. Terhune, as executor of his father, sold the lands of which his father died seised, under the power of sale contained in the will, to Daniel P. Morse, for the sum of $1,000, and duly made a deed of conveyance therefor. The deed of Morse is dated September 22, 1888, and was recorded in the clerk's office on the same day. As a conveyance of the property, the executor's deed was, in legal effect, subsequent in point of time to the sheriff's deed to the complainant. The complainant's bill was filed to set aside and annul the Morse deed in favor of the complainant's title under its deed from the sheriff. The charge in the bill is that Terhune, as executor of his father, made sale and conveyance to Morse under the powers contained in the will, to hinder and delay the complainant, a creditor of the said Richard P. Terhune, and to defeat the judgment the complainant had against him, and that the deed to Morse was fraudulent and void as against the complainant. The prayer for relief is that the deed to Morse be declared fraudulent and void, and that it be decreed that the complainant is seised of and entitled to the one equal undivided part of the tracts of land, etc., wholly unaffected by the executor's deed. To this bill Richard P. Terhune, individually and as executor, and Daniel P. Morse, alone were made parties. An answer under oath was called for. Both defendants answer, and in their answers under oath severally deny that the said sale and purchase were made to hinder or delay the complainant, or to defeat its judgment, or for any fraudulent purpose. Terhune in his answer sets out that, for the purpose of settling up the testator's estate, it was necessary to make sale of all the real estate whereof the testator died seised; that the property was sold for the purpose of enabling him to pay debts of the deceased, and distribute the proceeds of the sale according to the directions of the will, in case more was realized than was sufficient to pay the testator's debts; and that the said sale was made by him in good faith, without any fraudulent intent or purpose. It is not disputed that the testator was indebted to one Richard Romaine on a promissory note for $1,995, made April 1, 1877, payable twelve months after date. At the time of the sale by the executor, $1,000 were due on the note, which was paid by the executor, September 22, 1888, by the check he received of Morse for purchase money, and the note was taken up. That Romaine's debt was due from the estate of the deceased, and that $1,000 of that indebtedness was unpaid when the executor made sale, and that that indebtedness was satisfied by the proceeds of the sale are undisputed. Nor is there any contention in allegation or fact that the executor's sale was a fraud upon the power of sale, either in the manner of advertisement, or in the conduct of the sale, or in the price realized. The property brought $1,000 at the sale, the one-half interest in which the complainant bought at his sheriff's sale for the sum of $50. The bill is not framed in that aspect. The object of the suit is to appropriate to the payment of Richard's debt property of the testator put in trust by him for the payment of his own debts, to the exclusion of the testator's creditors. In such a contest as this, Morse, as purchaser at the executor's sale, must be regarded as succeeding to the rights of Romaine as a creditor of the testator. The testator by his will made disposition of his entire estate, to be wrought out by the intervention of the power conferred upon his executor. He directed that his whole estate, real and personal, should be converted into money, and after making provision for debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and an annuity to his widow, he gave the residue of the proceeds of his estate in equal shares to his two children. The will containing no actual devise of lands, the title and usufruct of the lands descended to his heirs-at-law, subject, nevertheless, to the power of sale and the trusts declared thereon contained in the will.

The estate which the heirs took at the testator's death was an actual estate, which was alienable, devisable and descendible, and liable to be seized and sold as lands; but, when the power of sale was exercised, the estate of the heirs or his alienee was determined, and the purchaser under the power became seised under the deviser by a title paramount to the title of the heir by descent. Herbert v. Tuthill, 1 N. J. Eq. 141; Den v. Snowhill, 28 N. J. L. 448; Gest v. Flock, 2 N. J. Eq. 108; Fluke v. Fluke, 16 N. J. Eq. 478; Wetmore v. Midmer, 21 N. J. Eq. 242; Leggett v. Doremus, 25 N. J. Eq. 122; Hollman v. Tigges, 42 N. J. Eq. 127-131, 5 Cent. Rep. 638; Moores v. Moores, 41 N. J. L. 441; Doe v. Jones, 10 Barn. & C. 459; Anonymous, Jenk. 184.

By the purchase at the sheriff's sale the complainant acquired only Richard's estate as an heir-at-law, subject to the trusts and power of sale contained in the testator's will. If the power of sale subsisted and was capable of being executed at the time of the sheriff's sale, the purchaser at the executor's sale took a title under the testator's will paramount to any estate derived from or through Richard. To prevail in this suit the complainant must show, either that the power had then expired or was extinguished, or present some equitable grounds on which, in a court of equity, creditors of the testator would be postponed in favor of the creditors of Richard.

It is insisted, in the first place, that Richard and his sister had elected to hold the lands as heirs-at-law of their father, and not have them converted into money, under the will, and the proceeds divided between them; and that the complainant is entitled to have Richard abide by his election. Where a testator by his will directs the sale of lands, and the division of the proceeds among his heirs-at-law, the latter may dispense with the sale, and elect to take the lands in lieu of the proceeds of the sale. The bill does not charge an election, and the proof of an election in fact is very meager. The only evidence on the subject is the testimony of Morse. He testified "that the tenant on the farm when he bought did not have the whole farm the last year. He rented the house for $60 a year, and part of the ground for a certain sum, which, if I knew, I have forgotten. The balance of the farm was rented to different persons. The gross sum which Mr. Terhune received for it was not more than $5 or $10 difference from the price I obtained letting it all to one person."

This evidence was brought out in the examination of the witness touching the value of the property. Morse rented the property for $125. There was a mortgage on it for $2,000, and the annual taxes were $86. The interest and taxes were paid up to the last due-day. For how long a time Richard received the rents, and in what capacity, and what disposition he made of them, whether he applied them to keep down the interest on incumbrances, to pay taxes and repairs for the benefit of the trust estate or for his individual benefit, does not appear. Mrs. Oldis never had possession or exercised control over the property. An election may be inferred from the conduct of the party whose province it is to elect, his acts, omissions and his mode of dealing with the property; but, in order that an election may be inferred from conduct, the acts done must be shown to have been done with the intent to elect, and to be quite decisive. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 515. The burden of proof is on the complainant, and the evidence adduced is insufficient to establish an election in fact by the heirs-at-law. The principle on which the doctrine of election rests is the identity of the interest the heirs take as heirs-at-law and in the proceeds of the conversion into money. Where the whole beneficial interest in the land directed to be converted belongs to the person for whose use it is given, equity will not compel or allow the trustee to execute the trust against the wishes of the cestui que trust, but will permit him to take the land if he elect to do so; but where there are several cestuis que trust taking different interests under the will from what they would do as heirs-at-law, there is no case for the application of the doctrine of election, and the executor must perform the trust created by the will. Fluke v. Fluke, 16 N. J. Eq. 479. Under the testator's will the creditors of the testator and his wife were interested in the trusts created by it as well as his heirs-at-law, and the interests of the former had priority over those of the latter. If Richard and his sister as heirs-at-law had made an election, and sufficiently manifested their purpose to do so, they would take as lands only the interest in the realty that was represented by the residuary devise, subject to the prior trusts with which the lands were charged. By no election or act of their own had they power to impair or discharge the rights of the other beneficiaries. In addition to this, Richard, whose estate is in controversy, was under a disability which excluded him from making election. He was the executor, and proved the will, and accepted the trusts created by it. He had not the capacity to do any act, in relation to the trust property, which would inure to his own benefit, and operate to impair or defeat the trusts he undertook to perform.

It was contended, in the next place, that the exercise of the power was not in good faith for any legitimate purpose under the will, but simply for the purpose of hindering and delaying the complainant in the collection of its debt. The charge in the testator's will of his debts upon his estate created a trust which creditors could enforce ex debito justicie by compelling the executor to execute the trust. It created also an obligation on the part of the executor to protect the trust estate to answer the objects of the trust; and it is no impeachment of his conduct towards his own creditors that of his own volition he took steps to execute the trust. If he had stood by and suffered the trust estate to be applied to the payment of his own debts, his conduct would have been a breach of trust. The only act indicative of fraud upon the creditors of the executor charged in the bill is that he induced the sheriff to adjourn the sale, and to postpone delivery of the deed, and hastened a sale under his power, that the deed he might make should be executed and delivered before the sheriff's deed. The utmost effect that can be given to that transaction would be to estop the purchaser from any advantage arising from mere priority of his deed in point of time. It could not avail to extinguish the power or defeat its execution, which would be equally efficacious whether the executor's deed was made after or before the sheriff's deed. In fact the complainant suffered no injury by the postponement of the delivery of the sheriff's deed. The deed operated when delivered as of the date of the sheriff's sale. If the court should be constrained to set aside the executor's deed on that ground, the power would remain to make a new sale in the interests of the testator's creditors with precisely the same consequences. Under this head it was insisted that the creditors of the testator by delay had lost the right to have the trust executed, the creditors of Richard having in the mean time acquired rights which a court of equity would protect against the execution of the power.

The testator died in January, 1879. The executor's sale was made in September, 1888, upwards of nine years after the testator's death. There is no Statute of Limitation applicable to a trust of this character. No limitation can be implied from the limitation imposed by the Statute making lands liable to be sold for the payment of the debts of a decedent. The power to sell to pay debts when the testator charges his real estate with the payment of debts is derived from the will; the title derived under such a power is title under the devise. So favorably does the law regard a charge of debts upon lands that the struggle has been with respect to the application of the Statute of Limitations to the debts so charged. There are cases where an unlimited power of sale will be restrained by the courts. Thus the courts will not permit the execution of a power where the effect will be to create an estate obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities. 1 Lewin, Tr. 605; Re Cotton's Trustees, L. R. 19 Ch. Div. 624. So also the court will not allow a power to be executed where, in the interval of time that has elapsed, the object for which the power of sale was created has been substantially accomplished.

In Peters v. Lewis & E. G. R. Co., L. R. 16 Ch. Div. 708, the testator devised his residuary estate to trustees, in trust for his wife for life, and, after her death, to pay and assure the same to his two unmarried daughters in equal shares for their separate use, "and, for the purpose of division," he empowered his trustees to sell his residuary estate. Vice Chancellor Hall held that the power of sale determined on the death of the widow, because the daughters as tenes coheredes then became absolutely entitled for their use, and the property was "at home." On appeal (L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 430) Jessel, M. R., said: "No doubt you cannot have a power of sale to change the nature of the interests limited by the instrument so as to exceed the limit of time prescribed by the rule against remoteness or perpetuity; . . . and the courts have decided that the powers, although framed in general terms, are limited by the nature of the limitations contained in the settlement or will; so that when, by reason of the expiration or cesser of the limitations, . . . the absolute interests come into existence, then the power is considered to be at an end." He dissented from the view of the vice-chancellor that the power of sale terminated on the death of the tenant for life, and held that, inasmuch as the power was not to be exercised until after the death of the widow, it might be exercised "within a reasonable time after her death occurred." It is manifest that the remarks of the master of the rolls, with respect to reasonable time, had reference to the rule against perpetuities; for the only observation he makes with respect to an interval of time being "reasonable" is that "no one would say that twenty-one years was a reasonable time." The learned master of the rolls was dealing with the validity of the power itself, and there is no indication in the opinion that he entertained the view that a power, in terms unlimited and uncontrolled by an inherent quality in the nature of the power with respect to the purpose for which it was granted, must be executed in a reasonable time or it will become inefficacious.

In Humble v. Humble, 2 Jur. 696, the testator devised his real estate to trustees for a term in trust, by a mortgage or sale of all or any part thereof, or out of the rents and profits, to levy and raise a sum or sums as should be necessary to pay debts and legacies, if his personal estate should fall short or be insufficient to pay the same; and, subject to the said term and the trusts thereof, the testator devised his lands to his three sons, Joseph, John and Thomas, and appointed them his executors. The testator died in 1798. The executors proved the will, and possessed themselves of personal estate more than sufficient to pay all the debts and legacies; but the personal estate was wasted and misappropriated, leaving certain legacies unpaid. In 1808, Joseph died insolvent, and in November, 1809, the surviving trustees under the testator's will filed a bill for payment of their legacies out of the real estate by a sale. Lord Langdale, M. R., held that the legatees were entitled to the benefit of the term in priority to the claims of the creditors of the executor. In delivering his judgment, Lord Langdale said: "It is not easy to find any distinct equitable ground on which to maintain the claim set up by the creditors against the legatees. Joseph was entitled to one third of the residuary personal estate of the testator, and also to one third of the real estate, subject to the legacies. He was also an executor, whose duty was to see that the legacies were paid, the personal estate being sufficient. Now, it must be said that the legatees ought to have seen that the personal estate was duly applied, and that this was so entirely their duty that, not having done it, they are not to have the benefit of the trust created in their favor in the real estate. That is a proposition which I think cannot be maintained. The testator intended the legacies to be paid. He gave the residue of his real and personal estate to three persons whom he appointed to be his executors; but he did not leave it in their option out of which fund the legacies should be paid, but created a term, which he vested in trustees for the purpose of raising the legacies if the personal estate should fall deficient to pay them. The personal estate did not fall deficient in consequence of the testator not leaving a sufficiency, but it did fall deficient in consequence of the misappropriation of it by the executors. Are the legatees, then, to be disappointed for the benefit of those who have done the wrong, or can the creditors of the devisees claim that which the devisee was not entitled to? The devisee was only entitled to the share of the reversion after the term should be satisfied. I am of opinion that the legatees are entitled to the benefit of this term."

In Howard v. Chaffer, 9 Jur. N. S. 767, the testator devised real estate to trustees for a term to raise money sufficient for the payment of such of his debts as his personal estate should be insufficient to pay. Subject to the term he gave the real estate to his sons, B. and T., whom he appointed executors. The testator's personal estate was sufficient at his death to pay all the debts and legacies. The debts and all but two of the legacies were paid, but the executors spent the rest of the personal estate, and became bankrupts, and had made several mortgages on the real estate for money loaned to them. The testator died in 1846. The bill to charge the unpaid legacies was filed in 1857. Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, following Humble v. Humble, decreed that the real estate, as against the mortgagees, was subject to the two unpaid legacies.

I have cited these cases because of the similarity of the facts upon which they were decided with those in the case in hand. They are illustrations of the extent to which courts of equity will go to protect beneficiaries under trusts created by a testator from the acts of the trustee, who, at the same time, is executor and an heir-at-law or residuary devisee. Those suits were brought in behalf of legatees. In the settlement of the estates of decedents, creditors always have a preference over legatees; and, in the administration of trust property, creditors of the testator, for whose benefit the trust was created, have a vantage ground vastly superior to that of creditors of the trustee.

No case has come under my observation in which a limitation of time has been imposed upon a power in the nature of a trust not limited in terms, unless where the rule against perpetuities is involved, or the power is controlled by an inherent quality in the nature of the trust or in the object for which the power was granted. In Souder v. Stout, 10 N. J. Eq. 377, Chancellor Williamson upheld a conveyance made by trustees under a power seventeen years after the power had accrued. In Moore v. Moore, 41 N. J. L. 444, the testator by his will directed that his debts should be paid out of his estate, real and personal, and empowered his executrix to sell and convey the real estate to enable her to carry the direction into effect. The testator died in 1884, and in 1886 the executrix settled her accounts in the orphans' court. In January, 1878, the executrix sold and conveyed the lands under the power granted in the will. To overthrow this conveyance the supreme court resorted to a presumption that the debts had been paid, and the power had ceased to have any legal existence, arising from the fact that the power had not been executed until more than forty years had elapsed after the settlement of the testator's estate. Pearce v. Gardner, 10 Hare, 287; Coff v. Hall, 1 Jur. N. S. 973; Marsh v. Love, 42 N. J. Eq. 113, 4 Cent. Rep. 867,—are cases holding that time limited in the power, unless it be made the essence of the power, is directory only, and that a sale may be made after the expiration of the specified time, the court having regard to the substance of the trust for which the power of sale was given. There may be circumstances and conditions under which the default of creditors, in not requiring the execution of a power in their favor, may amount to laches which a court of equity will lay hold of as proof of fraud; as where creditors, with the intent to protect trust property from the creditors of the person ultimately entitled, knowingly permit power of sale to be kept outstanding as a menace to those creditors. The ground of relief in such cases is fraud. But no case of this significance is made in the bill or established by the evidence.

Richard, in his answer, which is responsive to the bill, and uncontradicted, says that he had, for several years, from time to time, made effort to dispose of the testator's real estate at private sale, but was unable to do so. All that appears with regard to his conduct in delaying the sale is that he was holding the property for a market. Romaine duly presented his claim to the executor under oath, which gave him a status to entitle him to have his debt paid out of the assets provided for the payment of debts. He received from the executor substantial payments on account: in April, 1883, $400; October 16, 1883, $200; May 15, 1884, $200; and May 19, 1885, in sums paid at various times, $200 was credited on the note. In 1884 or 1885, he brought suit on the note, and on receiving a payment, June 30, 1886, $85, on account, did nothing after that except soliciting payment of the balance at different times. His debt was a bona fide debt. He had ample security for its payment in the charge upon lands by the will, which was on record, and notice to Richard's creditors that the lands were liable for the payment of the testator's debts in priority of any estate or right of Richard therein. In these facts I see no evidence of fraudulent conduct on the part of Romaine towards Richard's creditors which should deprive him of his rights as a creditor of the testator to have his debt paid out of the assets the testator provided for the payment of his debts.

The debt of Richard, for which the complainants' judgment was entered, was contracted in January, 1878, a year before the testator's death. The complainants did not give credit to Richard upon the faith of his ownership of these lands; nor were the complainants hindered or delayed in the collection of their debt by Richard's delay in executing the trust. They recovered their judgment in November, 1880, and might have proceeded at once to sell the estate of Richard as heir-at-law, subject to the power of sale conferred by the will, and might have gone into possession, and had the receipt of the rents and profits until a sale under the power was effected, and also would thereby have been in position to coerce a speedy settlement of the estate. The execution under which the levy and sheriff's sale were made was not issued until the 11th of May, 1888. By the supineness of all concerned,—Richard, the executor, who, as one of the residuary devisees, was interested in procuring a good market for the premises, Romaine, the creditor, whose debt was amply secured, Mrs. Oldis, who was interested with Richard in the residuary estate, and the complainants, who might have sold immediately upon the recovery of their judgment in 1880,—the power of sale was suffered to remain unexecuted until the sheriff's sale in September, 1888, precipitated the action of the executor in looking after the threatened diversion of the trust property from the purposes of the trust to the payment of his own debts. Upon the case made by the bill, and the facts appearing in the record, I am unable to agree with the views of the learned vice-chancellor that the title of the complainants under the sheriff's sale was superior to that of the purchaser at the executor's sale, and shall vote to reverse and dismiss the bill.

NEW MEXICO SUPREME COURT.

William B. CHILDERS, Trustee, etc., Appt.,
John A. LEE, Exr., etc., of William E. Talbott, Deceased.

(....N. M. ....)

1. The words "two-thirds part at least of the thing demised," which designate the rent to be reserved, in the exception in the Statute of Frauds as to leases for not more than three years, mean two-thirds part of the rental value of the demised premises, and not of the value of the fee.
2. An entry under a parol agreement for a written lease of a room for a year provided the lessor obtains a renewal of the ground lease does not create a tenancy from year to year, but only a tenancy at will, although the ground lease is obtained, where no written lease of the room is accepted or tendered.

(January Term, 1891.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Bernalillo County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover rent alleged to be due and unpaid. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. William B. Childers, in propria persona, and Needham C. Collier, for appellant:

The parol letting shown by the evidence in this case was a lease not exceeding the term of three years from the making thereof, and the rent reserved to the landlord during the term amounted to two-thirds part at the least of the full improved value of the demised premises. It therefore comes within the exception in the second section of the Statute of Frauds, and was good under the Statute.

- NOTE.—Lease for not more than three years; Statute of Frauds construed.

Putnam, J., said, in an opinion rendered in the case of Ellis v. Paige, 1 Pick. 47, published as a note to Coffin v. Lunt, 2 Pick. 70, that the constructions which had been given by the English courts to the exception in the Statute of Frauds as to parol leases which did not exceed three years, and which reserved a rent amounting "unto two-thirds part at least of the full improved value of the thing demised," contained no reference to the clause as to the rent reserved, and that the exception as to the matter was practically useless.

Some of the American courts, however, recognize the rent clause and enforce it. Gano v. Vanderveer, 34 N. J. L. 203; Cody v. Quarterman, 13 Ga. 386.

The New Jersey court requires one suing on a parol lease to show, in the first instance, that the rent reserved is sufficient to bring the case within the exception, and will nonsuit in the absence of such proof. Gano v. Vanderveer, supra.

The Georgia court holds that the fact that the lease is within the Statute is a matter of defense, which must be pleaded before plaintiff is compelled to show that his case is within the exception. McDougald v. Banks, 13 Ga. 451.

The authority seems unanimous, so far as it goes, that the clause means two thirds the full rental value of the property. Union Bkg. Co. v. Gittings, 45 Md. 181.

The English Statute of Frauds expressly limits parol leases to those not exceeding three years from the making thereof; and this rule is followed in some of the States (2 Reed, Stat. Fr. § 818) and in Canada. See Kaatz v. White, 19 U. C. C. P. 36; Brewing v. Berryman, 3 Pugs. (N. B.) 115; Hurley v. McDonnell, 11 U. C. Q. B. 208, cited in Woodfall, Land. and T. § 127, note.

Where the clause "from the making thereof" is omitted from the Statute, the number of years is generally considered "solely with reference to the duration of the term." Woodfall, Land. and T. § 127; 2 Reed, Stat. Fr. § 814, citing Sears v. Smith, 3 Colo. 290; Sobey v. Briscoe, 20 Iowa, 105; Jones v. Marcy, 49 Iowa, 188; Steininger v. Williams, 63 Ga. 475; Taggard v. Roosevelt, 2 *E. D. Under the English Statute, if the rent reserved does not amount unto two-thirds parts at the least of the full value of the thing demised, it is void at law as a lease, but may operate as an agreement for a lease. Parker v. Taswell, 2 De G. & J. 559, 27 L. J. Ch. 812; Cowen v. Phillips, 38 Beav. 18; Bond v. Rosling, 1 Best & S. 371; Rollason v. Leon, 7 Hurlst. & N. 73; Tidey v. Mollett, 16 *C. B. N. Seeds, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is the second time that this case has been in this court. It is reported in 4 N. M. 168, as Childers v. Talbott. The defendant, Talbott, having died since the first hearing, his executor, John A. Lee, was substituted in his place upon the record. There was a retrial before a jury, and, upon motion of the defendant, the court instructed the jury to find for him. It is an action in assumpsit against the executor, Lee, for an alleged balance due upon a parol lease. The appellee contends (1) that the lease was void, as being within the Statute of Frauds, in that it was not to be performed within a year from its agreement; (2) that it did not come under the exception mentioned in section 2 of said Statute, which provides, "except, nevertheless, all leases not exceeding the term of three years from the making thereof, whereupon the rent reserved to the landlord during such term shall amount to two-thirds part at the least of the thing demised," because the amount in value reserved as rent herein means two thirds of the value of the fee, not the rental value; and (3) that the contract testified to was a mere executory agreement for a lease in writing upon certain conditions, which were never fulfilled, and that notwithstanding the entry and payment of rent, it was never anything more than an agreement for a future lease, and the occupancy was simply a tenancy at will. The appellant contends, upon the other hand, (1) that the oral lease is good under the second section of the Statute of Frauds; (2) that, even if it were not, when a party enters under an agreement for a lease for years he becomes, by the payment of rent, a tenant from year to year; (3) an agreement for a lease, under which the lessee goes into possession and pays rent, will be construed to be a present demise; (4) a failure of the lessor to tender a written lease will not justify the lessee in repudiating the contract, — he should demand the lease; (5) though a parol lease, or an agreement for a lease, be void under the Statute of Frauds, yet if the lessee enters under it the contract will be enforced. He assigns as error therefore (1) the directing of a verdict for the defendant; (2) in overruling the plaintiff's motion for a new trial; (3) in giving judgment for the defendant.

As to the first two contentions of the defendant there is not now room for argument, for while the contract was not to be performed within a year, yet it was a lease for less than three years, upon which the rent reserved was at least two-thirds part of the thing demised; and it is now held in this Territory, and is the general holding of the courts of the country, that this means two-thirds part of the rental value of the demised premises. Childers v. Talbott, 4 N. M. 168. Whether or not the contention of the appellant is correct depends entirely upon the nature of the holding by Talbott. Was he holding under the oral lease which was to be afterwards simply put into writing? All the testimony was introduced by the plaintiff. The testimony of the defendant, Talbott, taken upon the previous hearing, was introduced by the plaintiff. The evidence was practically unanimous that Mr. Talbott was to have the lease of the room for one year at a monthly rental of $60 from April 1, 1888, provided that the plaintiff could secure a renewal of the ground lease, which terminated about June 1, 1888; that Talbott went into possession April 1, 1888; that no lease in writing was ever tendered to the defendant; that he objected to the closing of a certain door between his room and an adjoining one used as an opera house; that upon the failure of the plaintiff to open said door he returned the keys to the plaintiff's cestui que trust, and tendered the balance of rent up to the time of leaving, which was declined, though the keys were retained. Whether or not this oral agreement between Childers and Talbott was a lease, or only an agreement for a lease, depends upon the terms thereof, and the action of the parties under it.

If there is a condition attached to the granting of the lease, and it is to be subsequently executed, it operates only as an agreement for a lease. Taylor, Land, and T. 5th ed. § 89.

"Whenever, therefore, the instrument makes the demise dependent on a condition or stipulation yet to be performed, it operates as an agreement only." Id. § 40.

It is quite certain, then, that the agreement testified to was an agreement for a lease, and until Talbott obtained a written lease, or was entitled to one under this contract, that his holding, whatever its character and consequences, depended entirely upon the oral agreement for a lease. He entered under that. It is contended, therefore, that, as the agreement was for a year, the law contemplates the taking possession and paying the rent as a present demise, and that the tenancy is one from year to year. To this proposition the appellant cites an array of authorities which, if in point, would be absolutely decisive of the question. The cases of Kerr v. Clark, 19 Mo. 182; Laughran v. Smith, 75 N. Y. 206, and Kopitz v. Gustavus, 48 Wis. 48, are typical of the doctrine contended for, yet in each case the contract was an oral agreement for a term of years, upon which term the tenant had entered and occupied over one year. It was held in these cases that the terms of the agreement and the acts of the parties conclusively showed that it was an agreement for a lease from year to year. In all these cases where there was an agreement for a lease, and an entry under that agreement, and the courts have held the tenancy to be in accordance with the oral contract, it was possible for the tenant at any time to demand the written lease, and for the landlord to give it. In the case at bar that rule would not hold. At any time before the renewal of the ground lease by the plaintiff it would have been impossible for the landlord to have given a written lease which would have then and there invested the tenant with a term for a year. Yet the contention is that what the landlord could not do the law by implication will do; for the argument is that, when the tenant entered under the oral agreement, he at once entered upon a tenancy from year to year; not when the ground lease was obtained, but upon April 1. All the rights of such a tenancy then attached as against the tenant, and, as the rights of the landlord and tenant are reciprocal, against the landlord. Put the position to the test. If, now, the plaintiff had failed to obtain the ground lease, could Talbott have sued Childers for damage for a failure to protect him in his yearly tenancy? Clearly not, under the lease agreed for, for that was a conditional lease; but if, in spite of that condition, he was in for a year under the oral agreement, then the landlord could have been held for damages for a failure to make the term good. This was not contemplated by either the terms of the agreement or acts of the parties. It is quite evident that, under the facts in this case, the tenancy here was not from year to year, but at most at will.

If the tenant had taken the written lease which had been agreed upon, when the plaintiff was in a position to give it, or if it had been tendered him, and without a legal reason he had refused it, there would then have been no question but that the term would have been changed into one from year to year. But there is no evidence whatever that a written lease was ever tendered him; such lease was to be given when the plaintiff obtained a renewal of the ground lease. The presentation of such a lease may reasonably have been considered notice that the plaintiff had received the renewal lease. The fact that the plaintiff did receive the renewal lease did not raise any obligation upon the part of Talbott to demand that the plaintiff should do what he agreed to do. If the plaintiff sought to hold Talbott upon a contract which was to be in writing, and he was to place it in that form, it was his duty to do so, not Talbott's. The cases cited by the plaintiff, being Fuller v. Hubbard, 6 Cow. 1, and Goodfellows v. Noble, 25 Mo. 60, do not sustain the principle contended for. The fatal error upon which the plaintiff bases his whole case is in assuming that the agreement for a written lease upon conditions, and an entry thereunder, is the creation of a tenancy from year to year absolute in its character, which binds the defendant to pay a year's rent, unless six months' notice of intention to vacate is given. The acts of Talbott in objecting to the closing of the door, and leaving because of the failure upon the part of the plaintiff to remedy it, must be considered in reference to the tenancy which he then had,—that at will. It was that tenancy which he terminated because of the alleged wrong of the plaintiff. If he had been tendered the lease agreed upon, and accepted it, or without legal reason had refused it, then possibly the reason given for abandoning the tenancy would have been fruitless. The plaintiff declared upon a contract which was only an executory agreement, and, failing to prove himself entitled to rent thereunder, the rulings of the court were proper, and the judgment is affirmed.

The words "lunatic or non compos mentis" in the Act of April 1, 1888, which provides that if personal estate of which a lunatic or non compos mentis dies seised intestate was derived from such person's intestate husband or wife it shall go to the next of kin of the person from whom it was derived, mean one who has not sufficient mental capacity to make a will.
2. The next of kin of a person are not deprived of any "property" by a statute which provides that on the death of such person his personal property shall go to persons other than his next of kin and therefore the constitutional provision as to depriving persons of "property" does not apply to the statute so far as it relates to them.
3. The right to transmit property by inheritance to one's descendants or next of kin is "property," within the meaning of the constitutional provision that a person shall not be deprived of property except by judgment of his peers or by the law of the land.
4. A statute providing that the personal estate of an intestate lunatic, if derived from an intestate husband or wife, shall go to the latter's next of kin, is unconstitutional, because the classification of persons thereby made is unnatural, arbitrary and capricious, in consequence of which the statute is not a "law of the land" within the meaning of the Constitution.

APPEAL by the next of kin of K. J. Morris, deceased, from a decree of the Chancery Court for Davidson County, which awarded personal property, of which Morris' widow died seised intestate, and which she derived from him, to her next of kin rather than to appellants. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Vertrees & Vertrees, for the administrator:

Class legislation which is inconsistent with the laws of the land is void. A law which makes an arbitrary classification, and which is against the plain and obvious dictates of reason, is void.

See Calder v. Bull, 3 U. S. 8 Dall. 386, 1 L. ed. 648; Bank of the State v. Cooper, 2 Yerg. 603, 24 Am. Dec. 517; Lynn v. Polk, 8 Lea, 169.

There must be a substantial difference, having reference to the purpose or object of the Act, between the persons included within, and excluded from, the Act.

Mr. Albert D. Marks, for the Morris heirs, appellants:

So far as the opinions of this court are concerned, there are only three limitations upon the discretion of the Legislature in its enactments affecting classes.

The first is that laid down by Judge Freeman in his dissenting opinion in the case of Luckrman v. Shelby County Taxing Dist., 2 Lea, 425, which, in effect, holds that the Legislature cannot create and legislate for a class whose members are to be ascertained by a test or characteristic existent at a certain fixed period, which designation or characteristic can never be attained to or had by any person or locality that may thereafter exist in this State.

See Brown v. Haywood, 4 Helak. 363; Mem

this v. Fisher, 9 Baxt. 239; Woodard v. Brien, 14 Lea, 520.

The next is in Demoville v. Davidson County, 87 Tenn. 214, to the effect that the class affected by the legislation must be a natural and not an arbitrary one.

See Hatcher v. State, 12 Lea, 368.

The other is to be found in Dickson v. Carson, supra, that the courts will interfere when the Legislature goes to the extent of caprice or folly in naming the attributes to mark the class.

From the decisions of this court, these rules for determining the constitutionality of Acts are fairly deducible:

1. Class legislation is permitted; but legislative Acts relating to classes must be general laws.

Davis v. State, 8 Lea, 376; Manley v. State, 6 Lea, 231; Theilan v. Porter, 14 Lea, 622.

2. A general law is one embracing and affecting all persons in general, or all persons who exist in the same State and are surrounded by like circumstances.

Hatcher v. State, supra; State v. Schlier, 8 Heisk. 281; Parks v. Parks, 12 Heisk. 683; State v. Rauscher, 1 Lea, 96; Fulgum v. Nashville, 8 Lea, 635; Robbins v. Tazewell Dist. 13 Lea, 303.

3. A law embracing only a portion of those who exist in the same State and are surrounded by like circumstances is a partial law and void.

Hatcher v. State, supra; Daly v. State, 13 Lea, 228; Green v. State, 15 Lea, 708; Raglo v. State, 86 Tenn. 272.

4. It is not competent for the Legislature, in defining those to whom a law shall apply, to use some characteristic existent at a certain fixed period, which can never be attained to by any other person.

Luehrman v. Shelby County Tax. Dist. 2 Lea, 463; Brown v. Haywood, 4 Heisk. 368; Memphis v. Fisher, 9 Baxt. 239; Woodard v. Brien, 14 Lea, 520; Burkholtz v. State, 16 Lea, 71.

5. The classes legislated for must be natural, not arbitrary.

Demoville v. Davidson County, 87 Tenn. 214.

6. It matters not how few the persons are, if all who are or may come into like circumstances be embraced, the law is a general and not a partial law.

Budd v. State, 3 Hun, 492.

Applying these tests to the Act of 1885, it is clearly good.

Messrs. East & Fogg, Hill & Granberry and John Lillywell, Sr., also for the Morris Heirs, appellants.

Messrs. H. D. Malone, Demoss & Malone, Thayer L. Kennedy, Sleyer & Washington and Breen & Taylor, for the Stratton Heirs, appellees:

This Act is unconstitutional.

No man shall be deprived of his life, liberty or property but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land.

Tenn. Const. art. 1, § 8.

The clause "law of the land" means a general and public law equally binding upon every member of the community.

Vansant v. Waddel, 2 Yerg. 270; 2 Coke, Inst. 51; Bank of the State v. Cooper, 2 Yerg. 605.

It is not true that every Act passed by the 12 J. R. A.

Legislature is valid unless a specific inhibition is pointed out in the Constitution. Such Act is not the law if it violates "the established principles of private rights and distributive justice."

Bank of the State v. Cooper, supra; Ottions Sav. & L. Asso. of Cleveland v. Topeka, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 662, 663, 22 L. ed. 460, 461; Taylor, Corp. § 456.

To be valid this Act should have applied to all intestates receiving personalty from a deceased intestate husband or wife, "and because it has not done so, it is not the law of the land."

See Bank of the State v. Cooper, supra; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 208, 209.

If this Act be valid, our Statute of Distribution would in effect declare: "The property which every widow receives from the estate of her deceased intestate husband is hers absolutely, and if she dies intestate her children or collateral kin shall inherit it; but lunatics shall not have the benefit of this Statute. They shall hold such property for life, and upon their death their children or collateral kin shall not inherit it—it shall go to the heirs of the party from whom derived." That this is unconstitutional and void seems evident.

Raglo v. State, 86 Tenn. 272; Hatcher v. State, 12 Lea, 368; Burkholtz v. State, 16 Lea, 71; Green v. State, 15 Lea, 708; Woodard v. Brien, 14 Lea, 520.

Infants constitute a proper class for legislation, but no one will contend that the Legislature would have the power to deny to them the benefit of the Statute of Descent and Distribution.

Baxter, Sp. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

K. J. Morris, when about sixteen or seventeen years old, began mercantile life as a clerk in a store in Nashville. He was very poor, but, being industrious and economical, he saved money from his salary. In 1842 he married Jane M. Stratton. In 1845, he became a member of the partnership of Lanier, Morris & Co., and he contributed $4,000 as his share of the capital of that firm. About one month before the formation of said partnership, he and his wife sold a negro woman and three children for $1,175. The negro woman had been bequeathed to Mrs. Morris by her aunt, but there is nothing to show that Morris used the proceeds of the sale in contributing his share to the capital of said firm, except the fact that his financial condition at the time renders it probable that he was compelled to do so. His connection with that firm was the foundation of his success, which, while slow, was steady and sure. His estate at his death was valued at over $200,000. The early years of his married life were as happy as they were prosperous. His wife was a home-staying, husband-loving woman. She was quiet and retiring in her disposition, industrious and economical in her habits. She made most of her own clothing, and much of her husband's underwear. She was an excellent housekeeper and a fine manager. How much her wise and economical management of their household affairs may have contributed to her husband's financial success in life, we have no means of knowing. She had but one child, a son, and he was her idol. In 1861, when he was about seventeen years old, he was accidentally killed, and she was never the same woman afterwards. She withdrew from society, became gloomy and melancholy in her disposition, and would frequently fall into spells of uncontrollable weeping. In 1882, she was fearfully afflicted with carbuncles. The disease finally merged into cataplexy, and her mind became visibly and seriously impaired. On April 19, 1884, her husband died intestate, and without issue, leaving his wife surviving him. His real estate was valued at $100,000, and his personal estate at $120,000. According to the Statutes of Descent and Distribution then in force his real estate went to his heirs-at-law, and his personal estate went to his widow, and, if those Statutes had remained in force and she had died intestate, unmarried and without issue, the personal estate inherited by her from her husband would have gone to her next of kin. On April 24, 1884, just five days after her husband's death, her brother Madison Stratton, who is one of the complainants, filed a petition against Mrs. Morris, in the County Court of Davidson County, in which petition he averred that she was then "a lunatic, or a person of unsound mind," and had been for nearly or quite two years, and that, by reason of her mental infirmities, as aforesaid, she was "entirely incapable of managing, or in any way controlling, her said property and estate, or of taking care of her own person." Mr. Kennedy, one of the solicitors who signed the petition, is the husband of one of the nieces of Mrs. Morris. A guardian ad litem was appointed for Mrs. Morris, testimony was taken and the jury of inquest found that she was a person of unsound mind, so that she had not capacity sufficient for the government of herself and her property; that the said unsoundness of mind and mental incapacity had "existed for about eighteen months, and that it resulted principally, if not wholly, from physical afflictions, and from physical causes." The verdict of the jury was made the judgment of the court on the 1st day of May, 1884, and a guardian of her person and property was appointed, who is the husband of one of her nieces. She remained under said guardianship until her death. At the first session of the Legislature which met after she had been declared a lunatic, Mr. Robert L. Morris, a nephew of her husband, prepared a bill, which was passed by the Legislature April 1, 1885, as chapter 88 of the Acts of 1885, the effect of which, if constitutional, will be to give the personal estate which Mrs. Morris inherited from her husband to her husband's next of kin, instead of to her own, provided it shall be found that she was "a lunatic, or non compos mentis." Mr. Morris says that he spoke to five members of the Legislature regarding the passage of the law, explaining to them its scope and bearing, and its effect upon the estate of K. J. Morris. He spoke to them of the hardship of the existing Statute of Descent and Distribution, as illustrated by this estate, and that there was a chance to modify one of its defects, namely, that which gave all of an intestate husband's personal property to his widow, in the absence of children. Mr. Morris also talked with Gov. Bate about the law, explaining to him, among other things, what effect it would have upon the estate of Mrs. Morris. The governor said that he was equally friendly with the Stratton and Morris families, but would approve the law on its merits, as he regarded it a good law. Mr. Morris says that he did not speak to any member of the Morris family about the introduction of the law, nor communicate with them in any way concerning it; but, after its passage had been recommended by the judiciary committee, he mentioned it to several persons who were members of, or connected with, that family. Mr. Morris charged no fee for anything done in connection with the passage of the Act, and he never received any compensation for his services. There is nothing whatever in the record to even intimate that he resorted to any sinister methods to influence the action of the members of the Legislature. On the other hand, there is nothing to show that any member of the Stratton family had any notice that such a bill had been introduced into the Legislature until after the Legislature had adjourned. Mr. Kennedy states that Mr. Morris never told him of the law until Mr. Kennedy found it in the published Acts of 1885, and called his attention to it.

Mrs. Morris continued under guardianship until December 19, 1888, when she died, intestate, unmarried and without issue. On December 20, 1888, Mr. Dibrell was appointed her administrator, and, on January 10, 1889, he filed a bill in the nature of a bill of interpleader, against the next of kin of K. J. Morris, and the next of kin of his widow, to settle the question as to which of them are entitled to the personal estate which the widow inherited from her husband. The next of kin of the widow (who, for brevity, will be hereafter styled the "Stratton claimants") insist that they are entitled to said personal estate, under the general Statute of Distribution of the State contained in section 2429 of the Code of 1858. The next of kin of K. J. Morris (who, for brevity, will be hereafter styled the "Morris claimants") insist that they are entitled to said estate, under said Act of April 1, 1885, which is as follows: "An Act to Amend Section 3278 of the Code of Tennessee, by Milliken and Vertrees (section 2429 of the Code). Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee that section 3278 of the Code of Tennessee, by Milliken & Vertrees, be amended as follows: If the personal estate, as to which any person dies intestate, and who was a lunatic, or non compos mentis, was derived, in whole or in part, from an intestate husband or wife, then, in that event, so much of the personal estate as was so derived, and remains unexpended, or in the possession of any guardian or custodian of the estate of said lunatic or non compos mentis, shall go to the next of kin of the person from whom it was so derived, said next of kin to take in the order named in said section in the case of the personal estate of intestates. Sec. 2. Be it further enacted that this Act take effect from and after its passage, the public welfare requiring it. Passed April 1, 1885. Approved April 6, 1885."

The Stratton claimants insist that said Act has no application to the estate of Mrs. Morris, because, as they say, she was not a "lunatic, or non compos mentis," within the meaning of those terms, as used in said Act; and they further insist that said Act is in violation of several provisions of the Constitution of the State of Tennessee. We think that the Legislature used the words "lunatic or non compos mentis," in the Act, to denote a person who has not sufficient mental capacity to make a will, and therefore the first question is whether Mrs. Morris, at the time of her death, was possessed of "a sound and disposing mind and memory." Since the passage of the Act of 1885, a bitter controversy has arisen between the Morris family and the Stratton family, and most of the witnesses belong to, or are allied with, one or the other of those families. The testimony of all such witnesses, taken since the passage of said Act, is subject to criticism, as being affected, more or less, by interest or prejudice. But the testimony taken upon the inquisition of lunacy in 1884, before said Act of the Legislature was passed, is subject to no such criticism. The inquisition was instituted and prosecuted by the Stratton family, and, though certain members of the Morris family were examined as witnesses before the jury, they were doubtless introduced by the petitioner, Madison Stratton, who was a brother of Mrs. Morris, and, at the time they gave their testimony, they had no idea that they would ever be interested in the estate of Mrs. Morris. At the inquisition, Dr. Thomas L. Maddin testified that he had been her husband's family physician for twenty-five years. He says: "I think she is a person of unsound mind, to the degree that she is not capable of governing herself or her property. Her mind is impaired by this disease. At times she has lucid intervals, in this sense: She recognizes her friends, and sometimes speaks in monosyllables of three or four words. I do not think she could give directions about her estate. If asked to sell a piece of property, she could not do so. She has not sufficient mind to make negotiations concerning property. She has not sufficient mind to govern herself or property." "She has not sufficient capacity to care for herself or property, and has not had, for eighteen months or more, except for minor physical wants." Dr. John H. Callender, superintendent of the Tennessee Asylum for the Insane, testifies as follows: "Her physician and nurse described to me her disease and accompanying symptoms, and the nature of her attacks. My opinion from these, and my observation and diagnosis of her case, was that her insanity and imbecility were progressive in character, and that it would end in final dementia." "At the time of my visits, she was so unsound in mind as to be wholly incapacitated to govern herself in person or property." All of the non-expert witnesses examined at the inquisition expressed the opinion that she was of unsound mind, and they stated the facts upon which their opinions were based. It is true that, after she was placed under guardianship, there was a steady and marked improvement in her condition, both physical and mental, and it is barely possible that, if she had lived a few years longer, her mind might have been completely restored. But we do not think that her mental condition ever improved, in fact, sufficiently to have enabled her to make a valid will. Mr. Dibrell, who was her guardian, and the husband of one of her nieces, testifies that she was not capable of managing her affairs, or of comprehending her property, or her property rights; that he did not think she had the capacity to make a will; that she had no conception of her estate, and never asked about it, or how it was being used or disposed of; and that he did not think she could have been intrusted to buy a calico dress. When Dr. Thomas L. Maddin was cross-examined in this cause, he was asked whether Mrs. Morris, to the close of her life, ever became mentally competent to buy and sell property, make a will and transact business, without the aid of a guardian. His answer was: "She was absolutely unable to do or say anything, or to communicate her wishes, and therefore, as regards her mental state, it was impossible to know either its range of subjective capacity or wish." Dr. Callender, when examined in this cause, said: "At no period of my observation of her, after Mr. Morris' death, did I regard her as capable, mentally, of taking care of her person, or managing her property or affairs, or of fully comprehending any but the simplest current events in her presence, and, at all times, not even then, and during all of the period of my visitation, though her physical health was sometimes quite improved, she was invalid in body, as well as mentally incompetent, personally, for the performance of any civil act. I saw her the last time about two weeks before her death."

A significant circumstance connected with the question of mental capacity, after the passage of the Act of 1885, is the fact that, though she lived more than three years after that Act was passed, neither she nor any of the Stratton claimants ever suggested the propriety of her making a will. If she had made a valid will, it would have at once taken the case out of the Act of 1885, and the fact that no one ever suggested the idea of her making a will is persuasive evidence that the Stratton claimants did not believe that she had the mental capacity to do so. We agree with the chancellor that Mrs. Morris was, at the time of her death, a lunatic, or person non compos mentis, within the purview and meaning of chapter 88 of the Acts of Tennessee of 1885.

The second question is as to the constitutionality of said Act. It was said by Judge Green, in Bank of the State v. Cooper, 2 Yerg. 608, that "there are certain eternal principles of justice which no government has a right to disregard. It does not follow, therefore, because there may be no restriction in the Constitution prohibiting a particular Act of the Legislature, that such Act is therefore constitutional." Mr. Justice Miller said that "it must be conceded that there are such rights in every free government, beyond the control of the State." Citizens Sav. & L. Assn. of Cleveland v. Topinka, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 662, 22 L. ed. 460. And Judge Cooley says that "there was never a written republican Constitution which delegated to functionaries all the latent powers which lie dormant in every nation, and are boundless in extent, and incapable of definition." Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 87 (175). The doctrine of this court, however, is that "the legislative power of the General Assembly of this State extends to every subject, except in so far as it is prohibited, either by the delegated powers of the federal government or by the restrictions of our own Constitution. He who would show the unconstitutionality of an Act of the Legislature must be able to put his finger upon the provision of the Constitution violated." Demoville v. Davidson County, 87 Tenn. 220; Davis v. State, 8 Lea, 377; Luehrman v. Shelby County Tax. Dist. 3 Lea, 438; Hope v. Dead-erick, 8 Humph. 8; Bell v. Bank of Nashville, Peck (Tenn.) 268, 270. See also Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 178.

"A statute cannot be annulled upon supposed natural equity, the inherent rights of freemen or any general and vague interpretation of a provision of the Constitution beyond its plain and obvious import." Davis v. State, 8 Lea, 378.

"The courts are not at liberty to declare an Act void because it is, in their opinion, opposed to a spirit supposed to pervade the Constitution, but not expressed in words." Luehrman v. Shelby County Tax. Dist. supra; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 171.

But, "in considering State Constitutions, we must not commit the mistake of supposing that, because individual rights are guarded and protected by them, they must also be considered as owing their origin to them. These instruments measure the powers of the rulers, but they do not measure the rights of the governed. A Constitution is not the beginning of a community, nor the origin of private rights. It is not the foundation of law, nor the incipient state of government. It is not the cause, but the consequence, of personal and political freedom. It grants no rights to the people, but is the creature of their power, the instrument of their convenience, designed for their protection in the enjoyment of the rights and powers which they possessed before the Constitution was made. It is but the framework of the political government, and necessarily based upon the pre-existing condition of laws, rights, habits and modes of thought." Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 86 (87).

"The right to private property is a sacred right. It was not introduced as the result of princes' edicts, concessions and charters, but it was the old fundamental law, springing from the original frame and Constitution of the realm." Id. p. 358. "The sense of property is inherent in the human breast, and the gradual enlargement and cultivation of that sense, from its feeble force in the savage state, to its full vigor and maturity among polished nations, forms a very instructive portion of the history of civil society. The exclusive right of using and transferring property follows as a natural consequence from the perception and admission of the right itself." 2 Kent, Com. p. 818 (820).

"The power of alienation of property is a necessary incident to the right of property, and was dictated by mutual convenience and mutual ual wants." 2 Kent, Com. p. 826; Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. top p. 498, note 1.

"The right to transmit property by descent to one's own offspring is dictated by the voice of nature. The universality of the sense of a rule or obligation is pretty good evidence that it has its foundation in natural law." 2 Kent, Com. p. 826.

"In the early periods of the English law, a man was never permitted totally to disinherit his children, or leave his widow without provision. The Roman law would not allow a man to disinherit his own issue without some just cause assigned in his will. The reason of the rule in the civil law was that the children were considered as having a property in the effects of the father." Id. p. 827.

One of the provisions of Magna Charta was "that the goods of every freeman should be disposed of according to his will, or, if he died intestate, that his heirs should succeed to them." 1 Craik & Macfarl. Hist. Eng. p. 558; Bl. Com. bk. 4, p. 424.

"In America, the right to acquire, to hold, to enjoy, to alien, to devise and to transmit property by inheritance to our descendants, in regular order and succession, is enjoyed to the fullness and perfection of absolute right." 2 Kent, Com. p. 827 (828).

"In ancient times, if a man died without making any disposition of his goods and chattels, the king, as parens patriæ, seized them; but not for his own use. He seized them to the intent that they should be preserved and disposed of for the burial of the deceased, the payment of his debts, to advance his wife and children, if he had any, and, if not, then those of his blood." Hughlett v. Hughlett, 5 Humph. 454.

Having ascertained how the rights of property existed in this State when the Constitution was formed, and that one of the objects of the Constitution was to protect and preserve those rights, we will next proceed to examine whether the Act of 1885 violates any of the provisions of that Constitution. It is insisted that it violates so much of article 1, § 8, as provides that no man shall be deprived of his "property, but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land." It is not contended that the Act of 1885 has deprived anyone of the right of trial by jury, and therefore said Act cannot be shown to violate that provision of the Constitution, unless it can be established —first, that it has deprived someone of "property;" and, second, that it is not the "law of the land." Any citizen may be deprived of his property by a statute, provided the statute is what is known as the "law of the land." It is when a statute is not the "law of the land" that a citizen cannot be deprived of his property under it. The first inquiry then is as to whether anyone has been deprived of property by the Act of 1885. It is insisted that the next of kin of Mrs. Morris were not deprived of any property, because the personal property which she inherited from her husband did not belong to them, and they, at most, had a mere expectancy in regard to it. The law upon this point is thus stated by Judge Cooley: "A right cannot be considered a vested right, unless it is something more than such a mere expectation as may be based upon an anticipated continuance of the present general laws. It must have become a title, legal or equitable, to the present or future enjoyment of property. . . . And it is because the mere expectation of property in the future is not considered a vested right that the rules of descent are held subject to change in their application to all estates not already passed to the heir by the death of the owner. No one is heir to the living, and the heir presumptive has no other reason to rely upon succeeding to the property than the promise held out by the Statute of Descents. But this promise is no more than a declaration of the Legislature as to its present view of public policy as regards the proper order of succession,—a view which may at any time change, and then the promise may properly be withdrawn, and a new course of descent be declared. The expectation is not property. It cannot be sold or mortgaged. It is not subject to debts, and it is not, in any manner, taken notice of by the law until the moment of the ancestor's death, when the Statute of Descents comes in, and, for reasons of general public policy, transfers the estate to persons occupying particular relations to the deceased, in preference to all others. It is not until that moment that there is any vested right in the person who becomes heir to be protected by the Constitution. An anticipated interest in property cannot be said to be vested in any person, so long as the owner of the interest in possession has full power, by virtue of his ownership, to cut off the expectant right by grant or devise." Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 859, 860.

It seems that, under the civil law, the children were considered "as having a property in the effects of the father," because, under that law "he could not disinherit his own issue, without some just cause assigned in his will" (2 Kent, Com. p. 827); while, at common law, the children were not considered as having a property in the effects of the father, because, under that law, he could disinherit his own issue without assigning any cause therefor in his will. But, where the father becomes hopelessly insane before making his will, and so remains until his death, he practically has no more power to disinherit his children, under the common law, than he would have had under the civil law. And, if children are considered as having a property in the effects of a sane father, under the civil law, it is difficult, at first blush, to see why the children of an insane father would not have a property in his effects, under the common law. The reason, however, is that, however hopeless the insanity may appear to be, there is always a possibility of recovery, and the ever presence of that possibility prevents the expectations of the children from being recognized as vested rights of property. We are therefore of opinion that the personal property which Mrs. Morris inherited from her husband was not the property of her next of kin, and therefore that they were not deprived of it by the Act of 1886.

It is next insisted that Mrs. Morris was not deprived of said property. It is conceded that it became her property at the death of her husband, and that it remained her property up to the time of her death. It is said, however, that the Act of 1886 did not interfere in the least with her possession or enjoyment of the property during her life, and, as her title and ownership were extinguished by her death, she could not have been deprived of it, by the Act of 1886, at any time. The argument is that the death of the owner extinguished her title and ownership; that the dead can have no vested property rights; that the power of the State to take the property of decedents, and dispose of it as it chooses, is unqualified; and therefore that the State had the right to take the property, at the death of Mrs. Morris, and make "a gift" of it to persons who were strangers to her in blood. We cannot assent to this argument. Ordinarily, no one can make a complete and valid gift of property, unless he be the full, legal and equitable owner thereof, and it is not shown when or how the State ever acquired any such ownership of the property here in controversy. Was it by gift, or purchase, or bequest from Mrs. Morris? If so, where is the evidence of any such change of title? Was it by escheat, or under the Statute of Distribution? If so, where is the Statute under which the State derived its title, either by way of escheat or as a distributee of Mrs. Morris? The contention must necessarily be that the State, while having no beneficial ownership in the property, had an absolute power of disposition over it. But this power of disposition must have been conferred upon the State, either by Mrs. Morris, who was the owner of the property, or by the Constitution, or by the common law. It is not pretended that Mrs. Morris ever invested the State, as trustee, or otherwise, with any such power of disposition over her property. No provision can be found in the Constitution authorizing the State to make any disposition of the property of an intestate citizen, who leaves next of kin capable of inheriting. The only remaining source of power must be the common law, and we do not understand that any such power was ever conferred, by that law, upon the king. On the contrary, so far from the king having the unqualified power to take and dispose of the property of intestates, the power, if it had ever been exercised, was, as we have shown above, surrendered by King John in Magna Charta, and, at the time the Constitution of Tennessee was adopted, the right of an intestate to transmit his property by inheritance to his own descendants was enjoyed, as Chancellor Kent says, "in the fullness and perfection of the absolute right." 2 Kent, Com. p. 828.

It is true that, in ancient times, the king, as parens patriæ, took into his possession the goods of intestates, but he took them not for his own use, and still less to "make a gift" of them to strangers. He took them, as said by this court in the case above cited, "to the intent that they should be preserved and disposed of for the burial of the deceased, the payment of his debts, to advance his wife and children, if he had any, and, if not, then those of his blood." Hughlett v. Hughlett, 5 Humph. 464.

If the State had the right to take the property of Mrs. Morris, and make a gift of it to strangers, the State had the right to keep it, and appropriate it to her own use; but we suspect that no one will maintain, at this day, that the State has the right to confiscate the property of citizens who are guilty of no crime, whether such citizens be testate or intestate, sane or insane, living or dead. It is certainly true "that the death of the owner extinguishes his title and ownership, and that the dead can have no vested property rights." The complaint in this case is, however, not that the State despoiled Mrs. Morris of any of her property after her death, but that, during her life, it deprived her of the right "to transmit her property by inheritance to her own descendants, or next of kin." The court is of the opinion that such a right is property; that Mrs. Morris was deprived of that property by the Act of 1885; and therefore that said Act is unconstitutional, unless it can be shown that it is "the law of the land."

The clause "law of the land" was defined in our earlier cases to mean "a general and public law, equally binding upon every member of the community;" but, by our later cases, it is defined to mean a law "which embraces all persons who are or may come into like situation and circumstances." Vansant v. Waddel, 2 Yerg. 270, 271; Walley v. Kennedy, Id. 555; Bank of the State v. Cooper, Id. 605; Jones v. Perry, 10 Yerg. 71, 72; Sheppard v. Johnson, 2 Humph. 295; Budd v. State, 8 Humph. 491; State v. Burnett, 6 Heisk. 189; McKinney v. Memphis O. Hotel Co. 12 Heisk. 107; Alexandria v. Dearmon, 2 Sneed, 122; State v. Rauscher, 1 Lea, 97; Davis v. State, 8 Lea, 378; Maney v. State, 6 Lea, 221; Hatcher v. State, 12 Lea, 870, 871; Woodard v. Brien, 14 Lea, 523.

Laws, public in their character, and otherwise unobjectionable, may extend to all citizens, or be confined to particular classes. Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 890. And it matters not how few the persons are who may be included in a class. If all who are or may come into the like situation and circumstances be embraced in the class, the law is general, and not partial. Budd v. State, 8 Humph. 492.

Citizens may be classified under article 1, § 8, of the Constitution, when the object of the Legislature is to subject them to the burden of certain disabilities, duties or obligations, not imposed upon the community at large. And citizens may be classified under article 11, § 8, of the Constitution, when the object of the Legislature is to confer upon them certain rights, privileges, immunities or exemptions not enjoyed by the community at large. If the classification is made under article 1, § 8, everyone who is in, or may come into, the situation and circumstances which constitute the reason for, and the basis of, the classification, must be subjected to the disabilities, duties, obligations and burdens imposed by the Statute, or it will be partial and void. And, if the classification is made under article 11, § 8, everyone who is in, or may come into, the situation and circumstances which constitute the reasons for, and basis of, the classification, must be entitled to the rights, privileges, immunities and exemptions conferred by the Statute, or it will be partial and void. It follows that the cases which have been decided upon section 8 of either of said articles are of equal value in arriving at the meaning of the expression "all who are or may come into the like situation and circumstances," and counsel in argument have properly referred to cases decided upon 12 L. R. A.

each of said articles. Before proceeding to examine those cases, it is proper to notice another limitation which is imposed upon the Legislature in making classifications of citizens. The limitation is stated by Judge Cooley, as follows: "The doubt might also arise whether a regulation made for any one class of citizens, entirely arbitrary in its character and restricting their rights, privileges or legal capacities, in a manner before unknown to the law, would be sustained, notwithstanding its generality. Distinctions in these respects must rest upon some reason upon which they can be defended, like the want of capacity in infants and insane persons, and, if the Legislature should undertake to provide that persons following some specified lawful trade or employment should not have capacity to make contracts, or to receive conveyances, or to build such houses as others were allowed to erect, or in any other way to make such use of their property as was permissible to others, it can scarcely be doubted that the Act would transcend the due bounds of legislative power, even though no express constitutional provision could be pointed out with which it would conflict. To forbid to a class the right to the acquisition or enjoyment of property in such a manner as should be permitted to the community at large would be to deprive them of liberty in particulars of primary importance to their pursuit of happiness, and those who claim the right to do so ought to be able to show a specific authority therefor, instead of calling upon others to show how and where the authority is negatived." Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 893 (890).

That statutory classifications should be "natural, and not arbitrary," was recognized by this court in Demoville v. Davidson County, 87 Tenn. 218-223.

It is believed that an examination of the reported cases will show that none of the legislative classifications of citizens which have been sustained by this court were arbitrary in their character. It will also be seen that all of them were made for one or the other of the following purposes, viz.: first, for the purpose of taxation; second, for police purposes; third, for the necessary protection of the particular class; fourth, for the release of a class from some particular obligation or liability.

In the case of State v. Schlier, 8 Heisk. 281, the classification was made for the purpose of taxation. The Legislature imposed a privilege tax upon photographers, which was graded according to the size of the town in which the privilege was exercised. There was nothing arbitrary in such a classification. On the contrary, it was natural and just that the classification should be based upon the idea that the profits of the business would be proportioned to the size of the town, and that the tax should be proportioned to the profits. Every member of the community was at liberty to engage in the business, and to exercise his art, either in a city, in a town or in the country as he might elect. In the case of Fulgun v. Nashville, 8 Lea, 685, the classification was made for the purpose of taxation. A license tax was imposed for the privilege of keeping an hotel; but there was a proviso that hotels having less than ten rooms should pay no privilege tax. There was nothing arbitrary in such a classifica-cation. It was natural and right that the tax should be graded according to the earning capacity of the hotel, and every member of the community was at liberty to engage in the business, and to elect whether he would keep a hotel of ten rooms or less.

In the case of Robbins v. Taxing Dist., 18 Lea, 308, the classification was made for the purpose of taxation. A law provided that drummers, and all persons not having a regular licensed house of business in the taxing district, offering for sale, or selling goods by sample, should pay a special privilege tax. The classification in that case was not arbitrary. Before the law was passed, resident merchants were required to pay a regular occupation tax, while traveling salesmen, or drummers, paid no tax. It was natural that the law should remedy this inequality by requiring drummers to pay a privilege tax. Every member of the community was at liberty to engage in the mercantile business and to elect whether he would be a resident merchant or a drummer.

In the case of State v. Rauscher, 1 Lea, 96, the classification was made for police purposes, as a regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquors. The sale of intoxicating liquors within four miles of an incorporated institution of learning was prohibited by a certain law; but there was a proviso in it that the law should not apply to the sale of such liquors within an incorporated town. The classification in that case was by no means arbitrary. It was supposed that the injurious consequences resulting from the sale of liquor near incorporated institutions of learning would be much reduced by restricting such sales to incorporated towns, where adequate police force is usually maintained. It was therefore natural and right to restrict the sales to such towns. Every member of the community was at liberty to engage in the business, and to elect whether he would sell within an incorporated town or not, and every incorporated town was allowed the privilege of having such sales made within its limits. Afterwards, the law was amended so as to divide the incorporated towns of the State into two classes, and to prohibit such sales in those towns which were organized under the Act of 1882; while the privilege of allowing such sales within their limits was continued to the other towns of the State. This classification was purely arbitrary. The efficacy of the police of a town was in no way dependent upon whether it was organized under the Act of 1882 or not, and, accordingly, this court held that the attempted discrimination between the different towns of the State was unconstitutional and void. Hatcher v. State, 12 Lea, 370, 371.

In the case of Theilan v. Porter, 14 Lea, 627, the classification was made for police purposes, to abate nuisances. An Act authorized "the several communities embraced in the territorial limits of all such municipal corporations in the State as have had, or may have, their charters abolished," etc., to condemn and abate as nuisances all houses which should be found to be in an unsanitary condition. The classification in that case was not arbitrary, but based upon the natural distinction between houses in a sanitary and houses in an unsanitary 12 L. R. A.

condition, and every community whose charter had been, or might be, abolished, was entitled to the benefit of the police power conferred by the Act.

In the case of Parks v. Parks, 12 Heisk. 684, the classification was made for the necessary protection of a class known as "cotton merchants, factors and brokers," by giving them a lien for the purchase money for cotton sold. The classification was by no means arbitrary. The business in which those persons were engaged had a special need for such a lien. Every citizen of the State could engage in the business, and thus become entitled to the benefits of the lien. The liens given to mechanics, landlords, carriers and others are all supported upon the same considerations. Davis v. State, 8 Lea, 880; Demoville v. Davidson County, 87 Tenn. 217.

In the case of Davis v. State, 8 Lea, 880, the classification was made for the necessary protection of witnesses from the rapacity of speculators; the speculation in witness' fees being deemed by the Legislature detrimental to the public service. Every citizen of the State, who should become a witness, would be entitled to the benefit of the protection afforded by the Act. The Act did not deprive the witness of the power of free disposition of his fees as property; because the claim of a witness for fees, being only a chose in action, was not assignable at common law, and, as the Legislature first made such claims assignable, it was equally within its competency to take away that quality. Upon the same principle, the Legislature may classify minors, married women, lunatics and other persons under disability, and enact statutes "for their assistance, comfort and support." Cooley, Const. Lim. 391 (389), (390). But in this State, while it is recognized as the duty of the government "to protect and provide for those who are incapable of taking care of themselves, it is a duty of the Legislature to pass general laws whereby this may be done." Jones v. Perry, 10 Yerg. 75. The fact that it is the duty of the State to "protect and provide for those who are incapable of taking care of themselves" proves that the State cannot legislate to deprive them of their property rights.

In the case of Demoville v. Davidson County, 87 Tenn. 218, the classification was made for the purpose of releasing all druggists from liquor dealers' privilege taxes incurred by them, where the liquors were sold in good faith, for medical uses only, and the druggist's license was not used by them as a blind to sell liquors as a beverage. It was held by this court that the class of druggists thus described by the Act form "a natural, and not an arbitrary, class," and were properly distinguished in their treatment by the State from those who had been guilty of selling liquor under the guise of doing a regular druggist's business.

We will now refer to those cases where the Legislature has attempted to make certain classifications among citizens, which classifications this court has held were not within the constitutional power of the Legislature to make.

In the case of Morgan v. Reed, 2 Head, 276, an Act of 1856 declared that the title of all persons to any slave sold under judicial proceedings, under the Act of 1827, and to which the heirs, distributees, etc., were not made parties, should be forever barred, unless suit should be brought within six months after the passage of the Act of 1853. It was held that the Act of 1856 was unconstitutional. The Act may in fact have embraced a large number of cases in which very many persons may have been interested,—in fact it was sought to be justified as a "relief measure,"—but there were no reasons why the Statute of Limitations should be reduced to six months, in order to meet the exigencies of those cases, that were not equally applicable to all other cases where void or irregular sales of slaves had been made.

In the case of Memphis v. Fisher, 9 Baxt. 239, an Act provided that municipal corporations with a population of 35,000 or more might prosecute suits without giving bond for costs. It was held to be unconstitutional; for, though municipal corporations possess some power pertaining to sovereignty, yet when they become suitors they stand as individuals, and there were no reasons why they should be exempted from giving bond for costs that would not be equally applicable to an individual.

In the case of Brown v. Haywood, 4 Heisk. 360, an Act provided that, in any county of the State where civil suits had been removed from the county in which they had been originally brought, they should be transferred back to the original county, upon affidavit of three unconditional Union men of the original county that justice could be done all parties. The Act was held to be unconstitutional. There were no reasons why suits already transferred should be sent back that were not equally applicable to suits that might afterwards be transferred, and there were no reasons why the affidavits of Union men should have any more weight than the affidavits of other men.

In the case of Wally v. Kennedy, 2 Yerg. 554, an Act provided that any suit, brought in the name of an Indian reservee, to recover certain lands, should be dismissed, if it were shown that it was being prosecuted for the benefit of any person other than the one in whose name suit was brought. The Act was held to be unconstitutional. There were no reasons why a suit prosecuted in the name of an Indian reservee, for the use of another, should be dismissed, that were not equally applicable to every case where the equitable owner of real estate sued in the name of the person holding the legal title.

In Bank of the State v. Cooper, 2 Yerg. 599, an Act of the Legislature undertook to deprive the debtors of the Bank of the State of Tennessee of the right of trial by jury, and of the right of appeal. It was held to be unconstitutional. There were no reasons why the debtors of that bank should be deprived of their rights that were not equally applicable to all other debtors where the debts arose from similar contracts.

In the case of Budd v. State, 8 Humph. 492, an Act created a new felony in relation to the officers, agents and servants of the Union Bank. This court held that it was unconstitutional. There were no reasons why the officers, agents and servants of that bank should be subjected to the felony in question, that were not equally applicable to the officers, agents and servants of all other banks.

In the case of McKinney v. Memphis O. Hotel Co., 12 Heisk. 104, an Act authorized a certain hotel company to contract to pay interest at the rate of 10 per cent per annum upon a loan of $100,000. The Act was held to be unconstitutional. There were no reasons why that company should be allowed to contract to pay 10 per cent interest that were not equally applicable to all other companies or individuals who might wish to borrow money; and there were no reasons why those who loaned money to that company should be allowed to charge 10 per cent that were not equally applicable to all the money-lenders of the State.

In Daly v. State, 18 Lea, 282, an Act, in effect, created, as a new privilege, the right to sell pools on horse-races, and to limit the exercise of the privilege to a certain class of private corporations. This court held the Act to be unconstitutional. There were no reasons why those corporations should be allowed the privilege of selling pools that were not equally applicable to all other corporations or individuals in the State, who might wish to exercise that privilege.

In Burkholls v. State, 16 Lea, 72, 73, an Act made it lawful to sell pools under certain circumstances; but it contained a proviso that it should not apply to counties having a population of not less than 75,000 inhabitants, by the United States census last taken just preceding the date of the offense. Davidson and Shelby were the only counties in the State which had 75,000 inhabitants by the last United States census. It was held that the Act was unconstitutional. There were no reasons why pool selling should be made unlawful in Davidson and Shelby Counties that were not equally applicable to all the other counties of the State.

In the case of Woodard v. Brien, 14 Lea, 522, 523, an Act declared that real estate should not be affected by the lien of a judgment, until an abstract of the judgment was recorded in the register's office; but it contained a proviso that it should apply only to counties that had, by the census of 1870, a population of not less than 40,000 inhabitants. Davidson and Shelby were the only counties in the State to which the Act could apply. It was held to be unconstitutional. There were no reasons why judgment liens should be recorded in those counties that were not equally applicable to all the other counties of the State.

In Neely v. State, 4 Lea, 316, the charter of a railroad company exempted its directors from jury duty. The exemption was held to be unconstitutional. There were no reasons why the directors of that company should be exempted from jury duty that were not equally applicable to all the citizens of the State.

In Green v. State, 15 Lea, 708-710, an Act provided that 15 per cent of the voting population of a county might organize into militia, and be exempt from jury duty. It was held that the exemption was unconstitutional. There were no reasons why those who organized as militia should be exempt from jury duty that were not equally applicable to all the other citizens of the State.

In Ragio v. State, 86 Tenn. 272, an Act made it a misdemeanor for anyone engaged in the business of a barber to keep open bath-rooms on Sunday. It was held that the Act was unconstitutional. There were no reasons why barbers should be prohibited from keeping bath-rooms open on Sunday that were not equally applicable to innkeepers, and all other persons who kept and used bath-rooms for profit.

We conclude, upon a review of the cases referred to above, that, whether a statute be public or private, general or special, in form, if it attempts to create distinctions and classifications between the citizens of this State, the basis of such classification must be natural and not arbitrary.

If the classification is made under article 11, § 8, of the Constitution, for the purpose of conferring upon a class the benefit of some special right, privilege, immunity or exemption, there must be some good and valid reason why that particular class should alone be the recipient of the benefit. If the classification is made under article 1, § 8, of the Constitution, for the purpose of subjecting a class to the burden of some special disability, duty or obligation, there must be some good and valid reason why that particular class should alone be subjected to the burden. Another essential to the validity of every legislative classification, whether it be made under article 11, § 8, or under article 1, § 8, is that it must not violate any other provision of the Constitution, whether such provision be expressed or implied. Article 1, § 80, of the Constitution expressly provides that no hereditary emoluments, privileges or honors shall be granted or conferred in this State; and therefore the Legislature cannot, under article 11, § 8, grant any hereditary privileges or honors upon a class, however meritorious or large the class may be. Though the Constitution does not expressly prohibit the taking of private property for private use, yet it has been held to do so by implication (Harding v. Goodlett, 3 Yerg. 52; Clack v. White, 2 Swan, 549; Memphis Freight Co. v. Memphis, 4 Coldw. 425); and therefore the Legislature cannot, under article 1, § 8, deprive one class of citizens of their property to "give" it to another, however small or odious the class may be from which the property is taken, or however large and meritorious the class may be to which it is given. Under article 1, § 8, an individual may be deprived of his property in many instances, where the action of the Legislature would be clearly constitutional. The property of an individual may be taken by summary proceedings for the payment of his taxes, or, by judicial proceedings, to compel the performance of his contracts, or to recover damages for the breach of his contracts, or for tort committed by him, or it may be taken as a punishment for his crimes. But the property of an individual cannot be taken under that section, or any other section, of the Constitution, when it is taken from him merely to give it to another. A law which violates any provision of the Constitution, whether the provision be expressed or implied, cannot be the "law of the land," because an unconstitutional law is, in fact, "no law at all." Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 3.

The general Statutes of Descent and Distribution of this State, as contained in the Code of 1858, §§ 2420-2490, classify the citizens of this State into those who die testate, and those who die intestate. Any person, who has capacity in the law to make a last will and testament can select the class to which he will belong. He may make his own will, if he prefers to die testate; and, if he prefers to die intestate, he can adopt the disposition of his estate provided for in the Statutes of Descent and Distribution. If he from infancy, lunacy or other disability, has not capacity in the law to make a will, he cannot select the class to which he will belong. He is forced into the class of intestates, and the disposition of his estate is necessarily controlled by the Statutes of Descent and Distribution. Those Statutes direct that the land of an intestate owner shall descend to his heirs, and that his personal property, after payment of debts, shall go to his next of kin. In no instance do they direct that any part of his estate shall go to those who are strangers in blood to him. They are in full accord with the principle announced by this court that it is the duty of the State, by general laws, "to protect and provide for those who are incapable of taking care of themselves." Jones v. Perry, 10 Yerg. 75. They do not proceed upon the novel idea that the State has the right to seize upon the property of an intestate minor, or lunatic, and appropriate it to the State's own use, or give it away to strangers. On the contrary, they proceed upon the ancient doctrine that the king took the custody of intestate property, "not for his own use," but "to the intent that it should be preserved and disposed of for the burial of the deceased, the payment of his debts, to advance his wife and children, if he had any, and, if not, then those of his blood." Hughlett v. Hughlett, 5 Humph. 464. They fully recognize that "the right to transmit property by descent to one's own offspring is dictated by the voice of nature." 2 Kent, Com. p. 826.

In their main features, those Statutes have stood as the laws of this State from the time of its admission into the Union down to the present time, and, though various changes have been made in them from time to time, the principle that a man's intestate property shall go to his own heirs, or next of kin, has been at all times recognized and preserved, until the passage of the Act of April 1, 1885, which is the Act in controversy in this case. The Act, in brief, provides that, if the personal estate of an intestate lunatic was derived from an intestate husband or wife, it shall go, not to the next of kin of the lunatic, but to the next of kin of the person from whom it was so derived. It is said, though incorrectly, that the Act of 1885 was modeled upon paragraph 3 of section 2420 of the Code of 1858, which provides that, where land came to the intestate by gift, devise or descent, from a parent, or the ancestor of a parent, and the intestate die without issue, if he have brothers or sisters of the paternal line of half-blood, and brothers and sisters of the maternal line, also of the half-blood, then the land shall be inherited by such brothers and sisters on part of the parent from whom the estate came, in the same manner as by brothers and sisters of the whole blood, until the line of such parent is exhausted of the half-blood, to the exclusion of the other line. If the intestate have no brothers or sisters, then it shall be inherited by the parent, if living, from whom, or whose ancestors, it came, in preference to the other parent. If both parents be dead, then by the heirs of the parent from whom, or whose ancestors, it came. It will be seen that paragraph 8 of section 2420 of the Code applies impartially to all intestates; while the Act of 1885 applies only to lunatic intestates. It is said that the proportion of lunatics to sane persons is as but one to a thousand. One objection to special laws is that they single out one or a few odious or helpless individuals, and undertake to regulate his or their rights by a rule different from that which is applicable to the community at large, and by which the great body of the people, or the legislators themselves, would not be willing to be bound. Wally v. Kennedy, 2 Yerg. 557; Cooley, Const. Lim. 391.

There are no reasons why lunatics should be deprived of the right to transmit their property by inheritance to their heirs or next of kin that do not apply equally to persons who are sane. Suppose Mrs. Gee, who was a sister of Mrs. Morris, had derived personal property from an intestate husband, then, upon her death, as she was sane, the property would go, under the general law, to her next of kin; but, under the Act of 1885, the property which Mrs. Morris derived from her husband must go to those who are strangers in blood to her. Why should so important a distinction be made between two sisters? The only answer which we have heard is that one of them was sane, and the other insane. It will be seen that paragraph 8 of section 2420 of the Code applies impartially, whether the property came to the intestate by gift, devise or descent; while the Act of 1885 applies only to property which came from an intestate husband or wife. There are no reasons why an intestate widow should be deprived of the right to transmit to her own next of kin property inherited by her from her husband that do not apply equally to property which she may have derived from him by gift or bequest. If K. J. Morris had bequeathed the property in controversy to his widow, the Act of 1885 would not have applied; and the property would have gone to her next of kin, under the general law. But, instead of making a written will, he seems to have preferred to die intestate, and thus adopt the will which the State suggested for him in its General Statute of Distribution; and yet, merely because he left the property to his wife in the one way rather than in the other, she is to be deprived of the right to transmit it to her own next of kin. It will be seen that paragraph 8 of section 2420 of the Code does not apply except where the intestate dies without issue, and yet the Act of 1885 would have deprived Mrs. Morris of the right to transmit her own property to her own children. Her children by a marriage prior or subsequent to her marriage with K. J. Morris would have been disinherited, and even her children by him would have taken her property, not as her next of kin, but as his. It will be seen that, while paragraph 8 of section 2420 of the Code establishes a certain preference as between the heirs of an intestate, it does not direct that any part of his estate shall go to those who are strangers in blood to him. It does not deprive him of the right to transmit his own estate by inheritance to his own blood kin. But the Act of 1885 deprives a lunatic widow of all power to transmit to any of her blood kin any of the personal property which she may have derived from her intestate husband, and directs that the whole of it shall go to those who have not a drop of her blood in their veins. The minute classification and subclassification adopted by the Act of 1885 first forced Mrs. Morris into the class known as "lunatics," where the majority against her at once became a thousand to one. It then forced her into a subclass composed of only those lunatics who had derived property from a husband or wife. It then forced her into a still smaller subclass comprising only those lunatics who had derived property from an intestate husband or wife. The probability is that there are very few persons in the State who would answer the description of the subclass into which Mrs. Morris was finally forced by the Act of 1885. Assuming, however, that the Legislature has the power, in a proper case, to make its classification as minute as it sees proper, yet we hold that the classification must "be natural, not arbitrary." We think that the classification made by the Act of 1885 is unnatural, arbitrary and capricious, and, for that reason, we hold it to be unconstitutional. We are also of the opinion that it deprived Mrs. Morris of the right to transmit her estate to her own next of kin; that such a right is property; that the Legislature undertook, in effect, to take her property away from her, and give it to those who were strangers in blood to her, and, as the Legislature cannot take private property for private use, the Act violates the Constitution, and, for that reason, it is not the "law of the land." This conclusion renders it unnecessary to examine the constitutional question, as to whether the substance of the Act was sufficiently expressed in its title, or whether it sufficiently recites the law which it was intended to repeal or amend. This case, however, serves well to show that those requirements of the Constitution may have been intended to notify persons who may have an interest in opposing such legislation, as well as to inform the members of the Legislature of the true character of the legislation proposed to be enacted.

Upon the grounds above stated, we affirm the decree of the chancellor.

The costs of this court will be paid by the appellants, the next of kin of K. J. Morris, deceased, and the costs of the court below will be paid as adjudged by the chancellor.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Elizabeth BOWAR, Appl.,

CHICAGO WEST DIVISION R. CO.

(....Ill....)

1. The common-law rule that a writ of possession cannot be issued to enforce a judgment in ejectment after the lapse of a year and a day is abrogated in Illinois by the Statute which, though making no express provision as to writs of possession, provides that execution may issue upon a judgment at any time within seven years, especially when construed with another Statute providing that rules of pleading and practice in other actions are applied to actions of ejectment.
2. A writ of possession which has been executed will not be quashed unless a writ of restitution should be granted, as the quashal would otherwise do no good.
3. A writ of restitution will not be granted to restore to a defendant in ejectment the possession of property taken under a writ of possession merely because the latter was not issued within a year and a day after the rendition of the judgment.
4. A freehold is involved so as to give jurisdiction to the Supreme Court of Illinois of an appeal from an order of the superior court overruling a motion to quash a writ of possession in aid of a judgment in ejectment.

APPPEAL by defendant from an order of the Supreme Court for Cook County overruling her motion to quash a writ of possession which had been issued for the purpose of executing a judgment which had been recovered against her in ejectment. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Duncan & Gilbert for appellant.

Messrs. Goudy, Green & Goudy, for appellee:

A writ of possession irregularly issued will not be quashed, and a writ of restitution awarded, unless the defendant shows on his part some right to the possession.

Oetgen v. Ross, 47 Ill. 142; Coleman v. Henderson, 8 Ill. 251; Jackson v. Hasbrouck, 5 Johns. 366; Doe v. Roe, 4 Burr. 1996; Watson v. Trustees of Floral College, 2 Jones, L. 211; Doe v. Shail, 18 L. J. Q. B. 321.

The judgment in the case at bar is conclusive of the title of the appellee to the premises in question and of its right to the possession.

Taylor v. Hords, 1 Burr. 60; Ill. Rev. Stat. (1 Starr & C. 969).

The appellee had the right to take possession of the premises by virtue of the judgment without any writ.

2 Sellon, Pr. 202; Witbeck v. Van Benschlaer, 64 N. Y. 27; People v. Cooper, 20 Hun, 486.

Under the old common law in England, a judgment became dormant unless execution was issued within a year and a day, because that was the general limitation after which laches anciently attached. When the action of ejectment was invented, the practice, in regard to writs of execution upon judgments in ejectment, followed the practice in that regard already established in other cases.

2 Tidd, Pr. 1108, 1108, 1248; Runnington, Ejectment, 428.

In this State the practice in regard to writs of execution upon judgments has been changed by statute from time to time and judgments in ejectment have been subject to such changes.

Ill. Laws 1824, 1825, 150; Laws 1839, 220; Rev. Stat. 1845, Judgments and Executions.

The Statute now provides that writs of execution may be issued at any time within seven years. This Statute applies to and governs writs of execution upon all judgments, including judgments in ejectment.

Rev. Stat. chap. 77, Judgments; Rev. Stat. chap. 45, Ejectment.

Shope, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment of ejectment, remaining unreversed, is conclusive of the title of appellee, and of its right to possession of the premises recovered, without regard to the mode of executing the judgment. Rev. Stat. chap. 45, § 34.

It is contended that the writ of possession issued March 24, 1890, was irregular, and should have been quashed. The judgment was rendered May 9, 1888, finding the appellee the owner in fee simple of the premises in controversy, and awarding a writ of possession. No writ, however, was issued until the 23d of May, 1884,—more than a year and a day after the rendition of the judgment. It is therefore said that the judgment became dormant, and that no writ of possession could issue thereon without a revival of the judgment by scire facias. And such seems to have been the rule of common law. 2 Tidd, Pr. 1000-1007; 8 Bacon, Abr. title Ejectment; Oetgen v. Ross, 47 Ill. 147.

In the case cited it was said: "Where a plaintiff in ejectment fails to take out his writ of possession within a year after the judgment, it is doubtful if he is entitled to it without a special order." If a writ of possession issued within a year and a day, and was returned not executed, an alias might issue at any time thereafter; and if the plaintiff was prevented from taking his writ by injunction, or if it was stayed by agreement of parties, he might have

NOTE.—Writ of possession, under judgment.

If a party under a writ of possession should take possession of more land than was recovered by the verdict, or should attempt to disturb the possession of another not a party to the suit, the court in a summary manner will inquire into the facts and award a writ of restitution. Coleman v. Henderson, 8 Ill. 251.

It is doubtful if plaintiff can have a writ of possession issued more than a year after judgment, without a special order. Oetgen v. Ross, 47 Ill. 142.

To assign error upon defects in a writ of possession they must be urged by motion to quash. Parr v. Van Horn, 86 Ill. 228.

If defendant enters and removes growing crops after plaintiff has been put in possession plaintiff may have his action of trover. Altes v. Hinokler, 86 Ill. 275.

his writ within the same period after the dissolution of the injunction, or expiration of the time for which it was stayed, without scire facias. Tidd, Pr. 1005-1006; Freem. Executions, §§ 27a, 470, and cases cited; Adams, Ejectment, *346.

This same rule was applied to executions upon money judgments, and the rule in respect of writs of possession seems to have been adopted in analogy to the limitation upon writs of fiert facias. Tidd (2 Pr. 1103) gives the reason for the rule that the plaintiff is put to his scire facias after the year, as follows: "The reason why the plaintiff is put to his scire facias after the year is because, when he lies by so long after the judgment, it should be presumed that he hath released the execution, and therefore the defendant shall not be disturbed without being called upon, and having opportunity in court of pleading release, or showing cause, if he can, why the execution should not go. When the action of ejectment was introduced, it was doubted whether the Statute 18 Edw. I. (Westm. 2), which gave a scire facias to the plaintiff in personal actions to revive the judgment when he had omitted to sue out execution within a year from the rendition of judgment, applied to this action." It seems to have been settled that scire facias would lie on a judgment in ejectment, not because there was any such rule of practice specially provided for in ejectment cases, or because it fell within the Statute, but because such was the practice in similar actions. 2 Tidd, Pr. 1248. That is to say, the practice in actions of ejectment was made to conform to the existing practice in personal actions.

Without pausing to discuss or determine whether the time should begin to run from the 9th of May, the day of the rendition of the judgment, or from the 2d day of June, 1883, upon which latter day the term of court ended at which the judgment was rendered, it may be remarked that, if the latter date is to control, the writ was issued within a year from the entry of the judgment. It is probably held by the weight of authority that the time would commence to run from the day of the rendition. The Statutes of this State do not now, and never did, so far as we have been able to discover, contain any provision as to the time within which writs of possession shall issue in ejectment. If the reason for the adoption of the rule at common law is to prevail, a moment's consideration will show that such writs are not limited as at common law. Chapter 77 of the Revised Statutes is entitled "An Act in Regard to Judgments and Decrees, and the Manner of Enforcing the Same by Execution, and to Provide for the Redemption of Real Estate Sold under Execution or Decree." By section 1 of that Act, judgments of courts of record are made liens for a period of seven years, provided execution be issued within a year from the rendition of such judgments, and if not so issued they cease to be liens; "but execution may issue upon such judgment at any time within seven years," and then become liens from the time the writ is delivered to the proper officer to execute. By section 6, it is provided that no execution shall issue upon any judgment after the expiration of seven years from the time the same becomes a lien, except upon the revival of the same by scire facias. The Act is general in its terms, and would seem to apply to all judgments and decrees. The form of the writ of possession is given in section 43, chap. 45, Rev. Stat., and provides, not only for the delivery of the premises adjudged to the plaintiff, but provides that a clause may be inserted for the collection of the costs of the suit. It is apparent that, if the time within which writs of possession may issue in ejectment is to be determined by analogy to the rule applied in respect to the issuance of final process in other cases in this State, the limitation is seven years, and not one year.

By the Statute of this State, the common law of England, so far as applicable and of a general nature, etc., shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as of full force until repealed by legislative authority; and it would follow that the common-law rule being considered must be held in force unless changed by the Legislature. It is conceded by counsel, as it must be, that the repeal or change of the law contemplated by this Statute may be either by express enactment, or by implication from inconsistent legislative provisions. Section 10, chap. 45, Rev. Stat., provides: "The rules of pleading and practice in other actions shall apply to actions of ejectment, so far as they are applicable, and except as otherwise provided." It may very properly be said that this clause of the Statute applies more especially to practice in the trial of such causes; but it is not perceived why it does not require the practice in respect to the issuance and return of final process in other cases to be applied to the issuance and return of final process in ejectment cases, unless otherwise provided by statute. The term "practice," in its larger sense, is defined to be "the mode of proceeding by which a legal right is enforced, as distinguished from the law which gives or declares the right." Anderson, Law Dict. The rules of practice in other actions, applicable to actions of ejectment, which shall be applied, are those legal rules which direct the course of proceedings in acquiring jurisdiction of parties, and the course adopted by the court whereby rights are effectuated by the application of the proper remedies, and where it is not otherwise provided in actions of ejectment. Fleischman v. Walker, 91 Ill. 818, and cases there cited.

By section 10 of the Statute before quoted, it is expressly provided that so far as applicable to the action of ejectment, and in case it is not otherwise provided by statute, the practice in other cases is to be applied in such actions; and, if practice in other cases can be said to extend to the final process by which the judgment of the courts is to be carried into effect, it is obvious that such practice, whether controlled by statute in such other cases, by rule of court, or at common law, must, if not otherwise provided by statute, be held to apply in actions of ejectment. And by clear implication, at least, the common-law rule inconsistent with such practice would be repealed. We are of opinion that the common-law rule relied upon is not in force in this State. The reason for its adoption has ceased to exist, and the rule must fail. It is more logical, and more in consonance with the spirit of our laws, to apply and continue the principle upon which the rule applicable to ejectment was originally adopted, —that of analogy to the practice in similar cases,—and to hold that the judgment does not become dormant until after the lapse of seven years from its entry, and may be executed within that period without being revived. It ought, perhaps, to be further remarked, here, that the Statute now in force in respect of the issuance of final process generally is radically different from the Statute in force when the doubt was expressed in Oetgen v. Ross, supra.

If, however, the common-law rule prevailed, it must be conceded that the issuance of a writ of possession after the lapse of a year and a day would be irregular, except in cases where it had been enjoined, stayed by agreement, appeal or writ of error; but if issued after the expiration of that time it would not be void, but voidable only. Oakes v. Williams, 107 Ill. 154; Morgan v. Evans, 72 Ill. 586; Hernandez v. Drake, 81 Ill. 84.

Upon proper application before execution, the writ might have been quashed for such irregularity. After the writ was executed, its quashal could have done appellant no good, unless a writ of restitution had been awarded.

It was said in Oetgen v. Ross, supra: "It is to be remarked that in an action of ejectment the court that renders the judgment exercises a species of equitable jurisdiction over the writ of possession, recalling it if justice requires, and sometimes, after it has been executed, awarding a writ of restitution,"—citing Coleman v. Henderson, 8 Ill. 251; Ex parte Reynolds, 1 Cal. 500; Jackson v. Hasbrouck, 5 Johns. 366; Doe v. Roe, 4 Burr. 1996. In the case of Coleman v. Henderson, supra, it was held that where the party under his writ of habere facias possessionem had taken more land than was recovered, or disturbed the possession of a person not a party to the suit, the court would, in a summary manner, inquire into the facts, and award a writ of restitution. The current of authority in this country and in England seems to be that the right to award the writ of restitution in cases like the one at bar, not falling within any express statute authorizing such writs, arises by equitable construction by the courts, to prevent wrong and injury to a party who has been wrongfully dispossessed of the premises. Upon an application, as here, for a writ of restitution, it is not demandable as a matter of right, but as a matter of justice only. Watson v. Trustees of Floral College, 2 Jones, L. 211; Perry v. Tupper, 70 N. C. 538; Doe v. Shatt, 18 L. J. Q. B. 821.

If, therefore, the judgment in ejectment was conclusive against the right of appellant, both as to the title and right of possession, there could be nothing, even if the writ of possession had been quashed, to call into activity the power to award a writ of restitution. That the appellant could not demand the writ of restitution as a matter of absolute right, follows necessarily from the fact that the authority to award the writ in cases other than those provided for by statute is based upon equitable considerations. Here the law gave to appellee the title and right of possession; and there is no equitable principle apparent which would deprive it of that possession, and deliver the premises to appellant. For aught here shown, the court must, upon scire facias, revive this judgment, if dormant, and thereupon, by its process, put the plaintiff into possession, as he now is, in all respects. If possession had been taken of more land than that recovered, or the judgment itself had been attacked, or the party applying for the writ had shown meritorious reasons for granting it, or there had been improper use of the process of the court, the power might well be exercised; and many cases will be found where the writ has been granted under such circumstances. We have been referred to no case where it has been granted in the face of a judgment, conclusive not only as to the right of possession, but also as to the title, merely because the possession was obtained under irregular process. The plaintiff, having recovered, had a right of entry without the writ. In 2 Sellon's Practice, 202, it is said: "If the plaintiff has judgment to recover his term, he may enter without suing out an habere facias possessionem; for, where the land recovered is certain, the recoverer may enter at his own peril, and the assistance of the sheriff is only to preserve the peace." See also Witbeck v. Van Rensselaer, 64 N. Y. 27; People v. Cooper, 20 Hun, 486; Taylor v. Horde, 1 Burr. 60.

Finding the property unoccupied, the successful party may enter peacefully into possession, but he may not enter with force, and such possession would not be disturbed by writ of restitution while the judgment remained in full force and effect. If it be conceded that the writ of possession was irregularly issued, the same, being regular on its face and upon a valid judgment, would protect the officer in its execution, and the plaintiff would be in no worse position than if he had entered without process. It follows that we are of opinion that, if the court below was in error in not quashing the writ of possession, it is an error which cannot avail appellant against the force and effect of appellee's judgment.

A motion has been made in this court to dismiss the appeal for want of jurisdiction; no freehold, as it is said, being involved. The original action involved a freehold, and the matter here at issue is so far germane and pertinent, and so involves the recovery in the case, that we are of opinion the jurisdiction may be sustained. The object of this proceeding was to restore appellant to the possession of the land, notwithstanding the freehold interest recovered by appellee. To restore appellant, it necessarily followed that the judgment in ejectment must be set aside or disregarded. It is true, as we have seen, that this could not be done in this way; but that did not prevent appellant from seeking that relief. If the relief sought involved the right of the plaintiff in ejectment to his freehold, although it be found it could not be disturbed therein, a freehold was necessarily involved in the litigation.

1. Money in the hands of a county treasurer for a person entitled to the compensation paid in condemnation proceedings may, at the suit of its depositor, be withheld by injunction from the owner of the premises where a mortgagee has been omitted by mistake from the condemnation proceedings, and a decree may be made for the application thereof upon the mortgage saving the mortgagee's right to contest the sufficiency of the amount.
2. The principle that a person having two funds to satisfy his demand should not by his election disappoint a party having but one fund applies to a mortgagee omitted by mistake from condemnation proceedings, and who has a right either to foreclose upon the land or take the money paid for condemnation; and while the money is in the hands of the court, he may be compelled to accept it before resorting to the land, where his right is saved to contest the sufficiency of the compensation assessed in the condemnation proceedings to which he was not a party.
3. A court of equity may, in an action to foreclose a mortgage upon lands, part of which have been taken by right of eminent domain for railroad purposes, direct an issue to be tried at law to determine the value of the lands so taken, where the mortgagee was, by mistake, omitted from the foreclosure proceedings and is consequently not bound thereby and the railroad has been built and put in operation so that it would be against public policy to permit the lands to be sold to satisfy the mortgage while the remaining lands are not sufficient for that purpose and the mortgagor is insolvent.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case the appellant Railway Company instituted the proceeding for condemnation of land against the owner of the equity of redemption, and omitted to make the mortgagee a party to the proceeding. This omission was not due to the carelessness or negligence of the Railway Company, but was the result of a mistake. Section 2 of the Eminent Domain Act provides that the petition shall state the names of "all persons interested, as owners or otherwise," in the property to be taken or damaged. The holder of a mortgage upon the property is such an owner or interested party as should be made a party defendant. Here the mortgage to Dale was upon record when the petition was filed, and the name of the mortgagee thus appearing of record should have been stated in the petition for condemnation. In order to ascertain what persons were interested in or held liens upon the property, the Company applied to a firm of abstract makers and conveyancers, whose business it was to furnish information upon such subjects, and received from such firm a report as to the title, which failed to give the name of Dale, or to show the existence of the Dale mortgage. The Company was thus misled without fault of its own. It paid the whole amount of the condemnation money into the hands of the county treasurer before it learned that there was a mortgage upon the property condemned. The mortgagee Dale, and Drexel & Co., who were interested with him, must have known of the proceeding to condemn, because their agent and attorney was present at the trial of the condemnation suit. They did not, however, become parties by filing a cross-petition, as provided for in section 11 of said Act. The appellee Brown, the owner of the equity of redemption, and the only defendant in the condemnation proceeding, communicated no information as to the existence of the mortgage. Still, neither Brown nor the mortgagees were responsible for the failure of the Company to make the mortgagees parties. It remains true, nevertheless, that the payment of the money to the county treasurer would not have taken place but for the mistake of the abstract makers as to the condition of the record. Why should not equity relieve the Company from the consequences of such mistake?

Let us see what consequences might follow. The sum of $17,500 paid to Davis, the county treasurer, was not the value of Brown's equity of redemption only. It represented the full value of the property taken, and damages to the portion of block B not taken, the former being $4,600, and the latter $12,900. Brown insists upon the payment of all the money to him, and, if such payment should be made to him, he would be receiving more than the value of his interest in the property. Indeed, it is questionable if his interest is worth anything. The amount of the mortgage is $150,000, and the proof shows that it exceeds the value of all the property subject to it. The proof also shows that Brown's indebtedness is not less than $500,000. The mortgagees not having been made parties to the condemnation suit, their rights were not cut off by that suit. They are still entitled to foreclose their mortgage against the land condemned. If, therefore, the money is paid to Brown, the Company may be compelled to pay for the land a second time by the foreclosure of the mortgage. Such a result as this would be inequitable in the extreme.

Where the power of eminent domain is exercised, the fund paid stands in the place of the land condemned; the lien attaches to the fund; "the rights of the mortgagee remain unaltered, and he is entitled to have the money in place of the land applied to the payment of his claim." 1 Jones, Mort. § 706; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chamberlain, 84 Ill. 338; South Park Comrs. v. Todd, 112 Ill. 379; Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Sles, 128 Ill. 57, 10 West. Rep. 154.

It is true that Dale and Drexel & Co. have not filed a bill to foreclose the mortgage, although it is overdue; they have made no application to Davis to have the money paid to them, and have made no opposition to the payment of it to Brown, not being willing, according to the proof, to "make an enemy of Brown by doing it." But at the same time they are entitled to have the money as an equivalent of the land; their lien in equity follows the fund, which is a substitute for the land. Sherwood v. Lafayette, 109 Ind. 411, 7 West. Rep. 524.

This being so, there is reason here for the application of the well-known principle that a person having two funds to satisfy his demands shall not, by his election, disappoint a party having but one fund. 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1414.

Upon the assumption that the verdict and judgment would not have been more than $17,500, if the mortgagees had been parties, and subject to the other qualifications hereafter stated, the mortgagees may either take the money and apply it on their debt, or resort to a foreclosure of their mortgage against the land condemned and damaged. They have two funds,—the money and the land. The appellant Company has but one fund,—the land condemned,—and in equity may require the application of the money to the debt before resort is had to the land.

Section 14 of the Eminent Domain Act provides that the compensation may in all cases be paid to the county treasurer, who shall, on demand, pay it to the party thereto entitled. The judgment in this case orders that the "petitioner pay to the county treasurer of Cook County, for the benefit of the owner, or to John B. Brown, claimed to be such owner, the sum of $17,500." There is here no absolute direction to pay the money to Brown. The language is in the alternative, and contemplates that some other person than Brown may be the owner. Surely a court of chancery may determine who is the owner,—for whose benefit the money was paid. As between the mortgagors and mortgagee, the fund belongs to the latter to the extent of the mortgage debt. As between Brown and Dale or Drexel & Co., the fund belongs to the latter, inasmuch as the mortgage debt exceeds the fund. There can be no injustice in this view, as the appellee receives the benefit of the money when it is credited upon his debt. South Park Comrs. v. Todd and Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Slee, supra.

It is said, however, that the mortgagees, not having been made parties to the condemnation proceeding, did not have their day in court, and had no hearing upon the question as to what was a just compensation to be paid by the Railroad Company. This is true, and the mortgagees are still entitled to such hearing; they are not bound to accept $17,500 as the exact and whole amount to be paid by the Company without a chance to be heard upon that subject, either in a proceeding by the Company to condemn their interest or otherwise. Mills, Em. Dom. § 74; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 324; Wilson v. European & N. A. R. Co. 67 Me. 858.

But are they not fully protected in this regard by the decree of the circuit court? By the terms of that decree they are authorized to receive the $17,500, and have it credited upon their debt, and, if the balance of the debt is not paid, and they are obliged to resort to a foreclosure, they are further authorized to have a revaluation of the land taken, and a redetermination of the damages to the land not taken, either by an issue out of chancery, or by some proceeding of their own selection; and, should the amount of a just compensation be thereby found to exceed $17,500, to have the excess applied upon the mortgage. It is claimed, however, that the decree is erroneous, under the doctrine laid down in Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Slee, supra, where it was said that proceedings to condemn property under the Eminent Domain Act are legal, and not equitable, and that it would be inconvenient for a court of equity to remit the matter of condemnation to a court of law for trial according to the rules and practice in trials at law. The statement thus made in the Slee Case is correct as a general proposition, and as applicable to the facts of that case; but it can have no application to the circumstances of the present case, as will appear from a brief examination thereof. Here the decree directs that, in case of a foreclosure of the mortgage, the property mortgaged shall be sold in the inverse order of alienation, treating the taking of the strip of land condemned by the Company as an alienation. It is certainly in accordance with equitable principles that the balance of the mortgaged land be sold first, before resorting to the strip taken for railroad purposes. But it appears from the evidence in this case that the appellant Company has taken possession of the strip of land condemned by it, and has improved it, and built its right of way upon it, and is using the improvements. If upon foreclosure the debt is not paid by the sale of the rest of the mortgaged land, how is the lien to be enforced against the strip thus taken and improved? Shall the right of way be sold with the railroad tracks and other improvements upon it? Ordinarily, fixtures placed upon mortgaged premises by the mortgagor become a part of the realty, and inure to the benefit of the mortgagee by increasing his security. But it has been held that, in such a foreclosure as that now under consideration, the holder of the mortgage ought not to be allowed to sell the road, track, superstructure and fixtures, placed upon the land at great expense by the Railroad Company, for the reason that the public has an interest in the successful operation of the road, and that, therefore, equity only requires the Company to make compensation by paying the value of the land at the time it was taken, and interest on that amount. Kennedy v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 22 Wis. 581; Aspinwall v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 41 Wis. 474; Wooster v. Sugar River V. R. Co. 57 Wis. 811; Wilson v. European & N. A. R. Co. supra.

Hence some method must be adopted of ascertaining what the value of the land condemned was at the time when it was taken, exclusive of the value of the improvements placed upon it by the Railroad Company since that time. It would seem that the proper method to be adopted for such purpose is the statutory method, or that prescribed by the Eminent Domain Act for ascertaining the amount of compensation. Kennedy v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. supra.

The decree of the circuit court in the case at bar conforms to the rule thus laid down in the Wisconsin cases, and may be regarded as correct, so far as it has reference to the value of the strip of land taken. To what extent is it correct in requiring the amount of damages to the portion of block B not taken to be ascertained, and the excess thereof, if any, over the damages found by the jury in the condemnation proceeding, to be applied upon the mortgage debt? The verdict in that proceeding showed, separately, the value of the part of the block which was taken, and the damages to the part thereof not taken. The judgment also refers to the total amount as being for both value and damages. After the court of chancery has directed an issue at law to be tried to ascertain the value of the land taken exclusive of the improvements upon it, it could easily be determined at the same time, as an incident to such issue, what were the damages to the land not taken at the time of the condemnation. As such damages had the effect of lessening the value of the land subject to the security of the mortgage, it would be equitable to credit them upon the mortgage debt. But if the decree is erroneous in directing such damages to be ascertained, and the money now in the hands of the county treasurer is paid to the appellee, Brown, how are the mortgagees to receive the benefit of the damages in the event of a foreclosure? This is not a case where the condemnation money has already been paid to the mortgagor. The present bill was filed, and an injunction was obtained, while the money was yet in the hands of the county treasurer. If the money is paid to Brown, then when the foreclosure takes place the mortgagees will sell the land damaged, but not taken, at its reduced value. If there is no way under the foreclosure proceeding to ascertain the damages, and require the payment of the same, then the mortgagees will be remitted to their action at law against the Railway Company or Brown, the mortgagor.

In Wilson v. European & N. A. R. Co., supra, where the mortgagee was not made a party to the condemnation proceeding and the condemnation money was paid to the mortgagor, the mortgagee was allowed to maintain trespass against the railroad company. Consequently if the decree of the circuit court is erroneous in the particular now under discussion, it is difficult to understand why Dale or Drexel & Co. should object to it. It is favorable to them, in that it gives them a chance to show, if they can, that the value of the land taken was greater than $4,600, and that the damages to the land not taken were more than $12,900, and gives them the benefit of the excess, if excess there is. The mortgagees, however, are not objecting to the decree. Decree pro confesso was rendered against them. They assigned no errors in the appellate court. They have assigned no cross-errors here. It does not lie in the mouth of the appellee Brown to object to the decree, so far as it provides for the proceedings under the foreclosure hereafter to be had. The judgment already rendered in the condemnation suit is binding upon him.

He was a party to that suit, and introduced evidence upon the trial of it. He is estopped from denying that the sum of $17,500 is just compensation for the value and the damages. His assignments of error merely question the justice of the decree, in so far as it orders the money now in the county treasurer's hands to be paid to the mortgagees, and not to himself. As we hold that the money should be applied upon the mortgage debt which he owes, it is unnecessary to indulge in any further discussion as to those features of the decree which concern the mortgagees only.

It follows from the views here expressed that the judgment of the Appellate Court must be reversed, and the decree of the Circuit Court affirmed.

It is accordingly so ordered.

Petition for rehearing denied.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

Mary A. PARSE et al.

(....Ark....)

Buildings erected by a third person on land in the possession of a life tenant cannot be removed against the objection of the remainderman if they are not within any of the exceptions to the rule against the removal of fixtures by a tenant, although they were erected under an agreement with the life tenant that they should remain chattels and be removable by their builder.

(November 16, 1890.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover inter alia the value of certain buildings which had been removed from plaintiff's land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. U. M. Rose, G. B. Rose and Charles D. Greaves, for appellant:

Where the permission to remove a building is accorded by a life tenant, the removal must be made during his life, or within a reasonable time after his death, and any unnecessary delay vests the ownership in the remainderman.

A reasonable time means that it shall be removed with all convenient dispatch.

Burk v. Hollis, 98 Mass. 55.

The agreement between Parse, the life tenant, and Elliott, his lessee, for a license to remove buildings placed by the lessee on the lands held by Parse as tenant for life is not binding on the remainderman.

Mr. M. A. Austin, for appellees:

The general rule that the right of removal must be exercised at or before the expiration of the tenancy, is necessarily subject to exception in case of tenancy at will or for life.

The law does not fix the precise time for the removal, and what is a reasonable time is, where there is no dispute as to the facts, a question for the trial court.

Hughes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was the owner and entitled to the possession of a lot and a half of land, in the City of Pine Bluff, which is described in the complaint. He was the heir-at-law of his granddaughter Lizzie Parse, Jr., who had died without issue, leaving her mother surviving, who afterwards died leaving her husband, Melvin Parse, her surviving, and he thereupon became tenant by the curtesy of these lots. He afterwards intermarried with the appellee, and subsequently died, leaving appellee him surviving, as his widow, in possession of the lots, which she continued to occupy till this suit was commenced, living in the old residence, which was partly upon the lots, and partly upon a strip of land, owned by appellee, between the lots and Barraque Street, in said city. Melvin Parse, while tenant by the curtesy, gave John M. Elliott permission to erect a dwelling-house and some other buildings on the lots, and agreed that he might remove them, which were removed by the appellee and himself onto the land of appellee after Melvin Parse's death, and without consent of appellant. The circuit court awarded possession of the lots to appellant, gave him judgment for one half the rents of the old residence, less the taxes, insurance and repairs, and awarded the remainder to appellee, but decreed that the buildings removed were the personal property of John M. Elliott. Appellant presented the case here by an appeal. Had the tenant for life, or those claiming under him, the right to remove the buildings erected within the life tenancy by John M. Elliott, under the agreement made with him by Melvin Parse, the tenant by the curtesy, that he might erect and remove them? The right of a tenant for years and of a life tenant to remove fixtures erected by the tenant within his term has been much discussed, but generally not very satisfactorily. But we are relieved of the necessity of an extended discussion of it by the researches and able consideration and discussion of the identical question by Chancellor Cooper in the case of Cannon v. Hare, 1 Tenn. Ch. 22, in which he said: "The law of fixtures, particularly in the form of actual buildings, seems to be in a distressing state of uncertainty." And, after a full and satisfactory review of the text-writers, and the leading cases upon this question, he thus sums up his conclusions: "(1) that the general rule is that everything affixed to the freehold passes with the freehold, and that the rigor of this rule is only relaxed in exceptional cases; (2) that this general rule will prevail, even between landlord and tenant for years, unless the circumstances are such as to create an exception; (3) that an exception does exist, in favor of tenant for years, in the case of buildings erected principally for the purpose of trade, or in the nature of trade, or outbuildings not attached to the soil; (4) that no exception exists in favor of such tenant, where the buildings are erected for use principally as dwelling-houses, or with a view of adding to the yearly income; (5) that it is doubtful how far a tenant for life is entitled to the exceptions in favor of a tenant for years, but it is certain that the rule of exceptions as to him is of more limited range; (6) that the decisions of late years lay little stress upon the mode of attachment to the soil, and more upon the relations of the parties, the intention with which the buildings are erected and the uses to which they are put. See McDavid v. Wood, 5 Helsk. 95."

Those who claim under the tenant for life in this case fail to bring themselves within any of the exceptions recognized by the authorities. It follows, therefore, that the appellant was entitled to recover possession of the lot and a half described in the complaint, with rents thereon from the date of the death of Melvin Parse, the life tenant, including rents upon the houses removed, and to recover the value of the houses removed therefrom, with interest upon said rents from the time they were due, and upon the value of said houses removed from the date of removal, allowing the appellee one half the rents of the old residence upon the line, after deducting sums expended by her for taxes, insurance and repairs.

The cause is reversed and remanded, with instructions to enter a decree as indicated herein.

Hughes, J.:

Upon the motion to modify the judgment of this court in this cause, we have carefully examined the evidence in the transcript, and the answer of the appellee to the complaint, and find that there is no sufficient evidence in the same to warrant the court in determining the situation of the four-room residence erected by John M. Elliott before its removal; that is, whether it was wholly on the lot and a half of appellant, or partly on the strip of land of appellee. Wherefore said judgment is modified, and the question as to the location of said residence before its removal is remitted to the Jefferson Circuit Court for examination and determination upon further evidence in relation thereto. That part of the judgment of this court which awards the value of rents for said four-room residence to appellant to the time of its removal, and also the value of said building at the time of its removal, with interest on said amounts, is vacated. With the exception of the modification and change indicated, the motion to modify is overruled, and the judgment will stand as heretofore rendered, with direction to the circuit court to hear further testimony in relation to the location of the said four-room residence, and to proceed in relation thereto in accordance with the principles determined in this cause.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Calvin LONG, Appt.,

STATE OF MARYLAND.

(.....Md.....)

A sale of packages of coffee, on each of which is a slip of paper to be torn off, having on the under side the name of some article of crockery that the buyer of the package is entitled to, is a violation of Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 27, §185, prohibiting gift enterprises.

APPEAL by defendant from rulings of the Criminal Court of Baltimore City refusing to strike out certain testimony taken during the trial of an indictment charging defendant with a violation of the Statute prohibiting gift enterprises, and also refusing to acquit defendant. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. Benjamin Kurts, for appellant:

The term "lottery" or "a scheme or device in the nature of a lottery" means "A distribution of prizes and blanks by chance; a game of hazard in which small sums are ventured for the chance of obtaining a larger value, either in money or other articles."

Ballock v. State (Md.) 8 L. R. A. 671; United States v. Olney, 1 Dedy, 461.

In this case it is conceded that the "Big Bonanza Coffee," as put up in these pound packages, was worth twenty-five cents per pound, as compared to other coffee in the market of the same grade; and that this brand would bring that price at retail, without the gift of crockery ware made with the sale thereof. No consideration, therefore, was paid by the purchaser for the plate or saucer which he received from the defendant upon the coupons contained in packages of coffee purchased; in other words, these pieces of crockery were a pure gift or bounty bestowed by the seller upon the buyer, which he had a right to do as an advertisement for the sale of his goods.

Yellowstone Kit v. State, 7 L. R. A. 600, 88 Ala. 196.

By this scheme or device, the purchaser not only gets what he pays for, but, by the very terms of the contract, he has no chance to obtain anything more. In the purchase of the packages, he purchased the right to a certain article of crockery ware from a counter or assortment in full view, and he got no chance to obtain anything else.

People v. Gillson, 12 Cent. Rep. 616, 109 N. Y. 389.

There are no blanks in this scheme; purchasers are all placed on an equal footing; each one receives with his purchase a gift intended to be equal in value to any other article in the crockery collection.

NOTE.—Gift enterprise, a lottery.

A lottery is a scheme for the distribution of prizes by lot or chance. Bouvier, Law Dict. title Lottery. See United States v. Olney, Dedy, 461.

Any gift enterprise or raffle in which the public is invited to take shares for the distribution of prizes by chance is a lottery. State v. Clarke, 88 N. H. 329; Dunn v. People, 40 Ill. 465.

The fact that there are no blanks in the enterprise does not alter the rule. Wooden v. Shotwell, 23 N. J. L. 466; Randle v. State, 42 Tex. 580.

Gift enterprises or any scheme where tickets are distributed for prizes to be drawn thereon are prohibited by the Constitution. See Ex parte Blanchard, 9 Nev. 101.

See, as to requisites of indictment charging this offense and the evidence necessary to support the charge, 2 Wharton, Cr. L. 8th ed. § 1496; 2 Archb. Cr. Pl. 1775, 1776.

A scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance is a lottery. See notes to State v. Kansas 12 L. R. A.

Mercantile Asso. (Kan.) 11 L. R. A. 490; State v. Boneil (La.) 10 L. R. A. 60; Yellowstone Kit v. State (Ala.) 7 L. R. A. 599, 600; Webster, Dict; Worcester, Dict.

A gift enterprise is a lottery (see Yellowstone Kit v. State, 7 L. R. A. 600, and note, 88 Ala. 196), as a gift sale of books. State v. Clarke, 88 N. H. 329.

That a gift enterprise is gambling, see Bell v. State, 5 Sneed, 507; Dedy, Cr. L. 101 a.

The following schemes are lotteries: prize concerts (Com. v. Thacher, 97 Mass. 583; State v. Overton, 16 Nev. 136); prize tickets to induce subscription to a newspaper (State v. Mumford, 73 Mo. 647); raffles at fairs (Com. v. Manderfield, 8 Phila. 450); drawing works of art (Governors of Almsbouse v. American Art Union, 7 N. Y. 228); drawing presents on ticket to public exhibitions (State v. Shorts, 23 N. J. L. 398); prizes offered as inducements to buy municipal bonds (United States v. Zeisler, 30 Fed. Rep. 490); playing policy. Wilkinson v. Gill, 74 N. Y. 63.

Hull v. Ruggles, 56 N. Y. 424; Thomas v. People, 59 Ill. 160.

The defendant's act, which goes no farther than to sell a poor man coffee and give him a cup or saucer out of which to drink it as an inducement to purchase the "Big Bonanza," in preference to some other brand of coffee offered in the market without this attraction, does not present a case which justifies the court in torturing out of the Statute under consideration a construction which will bring the defendant under its condemnation in order to avert the evils of the lottery so vividly described in 2 Wharton, C. R. § 1491.

In these days of sharp competition in trade, the scheme or device adopted by the manufacturers in this case is a perfectly legitimate and harmless method of advertising their goods and creating a successful market for them, and such commercial enterprise should be encouraged and protected by the law, and not hampered or prosecuted by it.

Butchers Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 111 U. S. 747, 28 L. ed. 585; People v. Gillon, supra.

Messrs. William Pinkney Whyte, Atty-Gen., and Charles G. Kerr, for the State.

Fowler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant was indicted in the Criminal Court of Baltimore City for violating § 185, art. 27, of the Code of Public General Laws, which provides "that no person or body corporate shall be permitted, either directly or indirectly, by agent or otherwise, to barter, sell or trade, or to offer for barter, sale or trade, by any publication, or in any way, any wares, goods or merchandise of any description in package or bulk, holding out as an inducement for any such barter, sale or trade any scheme or device by way of gift enterprise of any kind or character whatever." The indictment contained two counts. In the first the appellant was charged with unlawfully selling merchandise in a package, to wit, coffee, holding out as an inducement for such sale a certain scheme or device by way of a gift enterprise; and the second count charges him with keeping a certain place or house for selling lottery tickets. To this indictment the appellant demurred, upon the ground that the Act of 1886, chap. 480, upon which the said indictment is based, is unconstitutional and void, and, the court having overruled this demurrer, the appellee abandoned the second count, which related to the sale of lottery tickets, and elected to stand upon the first count. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and the appellant was found guilty on the first count; but as appears by the record, no final judgment has been entered, and, the demurrer not being before us, the only question presented is as to the admissibility of the testimony excepted to, which is as follows: "That the defendant, Long, kept a general grocery store at No. 1731 Pennsylvania Avenue, known as the 'Northern Central Supply Store;' that on the 19th day of September, 1890, the witness Reilly purchased at said store from the witness Clark [the latter being a clerk in the employ of the defendant], for the sum of twenty-five cents each, three one-pound packages of ground coffee, called the 'Big Bonanza Coffee;' that on each of said packages so purchased was pasted a blue slip of paper, about three quarters of an inch wide, and extending nearly around the package; that the outside of this slip was blank, but on the inside of each slip was printed, respectively, the following: '1 plate,' '1 plate,' '1 saucer,' and that said slips of paper were pasted at either end of said packages in such manner as to be easily torn off; that the witness Reilly tore said slips of paper from said packages, and presented them to the witness Clark, who thereupon presented him with three pieces of small crockery ware, consisting of two plates and one saucer, which were produced at the trial, and offered in evidence; that these pieces of crockery were obtained by the witness Clark from a collection or assortment of crockery ware on exhibition in said store, and in view of customers, and that there was also displayed in the show-window of said store a number of packages of said coffee, and pieces of said crockery ware, and a notice or card to this effect: 'A piece of this crockery ware given with each pound.'" If the scheme which is thus shown by the evidence to have been adopted by the appellant, and which certainly is not characterized by any originality, is not a gift enterprise, it would be difficult to find words to describe it. Without discussing the decisions of courts of other States referred to in the argument, we base our opinion upon our own Statute, which in express terms prohibits "any scheme or device by way of gift enterprise of any kind whatsoever." Finding no error, the ruling of the court below will be affirmed.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Lucy A. CORSON, per Pro. Amis,

Ellsworth DUNLAP et al.

(....Maine....)

A judgment for the penalty with an assessment of damages so far as they have accrued, leaving future damages to be recovered by after process of scire facias, is required in an action on a penal bond, by Rev. Stat., chap. 88, § 32, where the liability of the party in 12 L. R. A.

the bond is a continuing liability, as in the case of a bond given in bastardy proceedings; but such a judgment is not required by that Act in an action on a bond conditioned to pay a single sum on a day certain, because in such case there can be but one breach and one assessment.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to a judgment of the Trial Term of the Supreme Judicial Court for Somerset assessing the damages for breach of the condition of a bond given in bastardy proceedings. Overruled.

Suit was originally brought in this case in 1886, and defendant was adjudged the father of complainant's child and ordered to pay to complainant towards the support thereof $1 a week to be paid at the end of each eight weeks. He was further directed to give to complainant a bond with sureties, in the penal sum of $500, conditioned for the performance of the decree.

Suit was brought on this bond and the law court finally gave judgment for the penal sum of the bond, execution to issue for such damages as accrued under the order of the court.

At the September Term, 1888, the case came on for an assessment of damages before a single justice, and he made the following assessment:

"Heard in damages by the presiding justice, judgment for penalty of the bond, execution to issue for the amount assessed by the court in the original action, including all sums due under the decree to last day of this term, with costs of that suit, . . . and interest on said sums, amounting to, . . . with costs of this action."

To this assessment, and the rule of assessment, the plaintiff excepted.

Messrs. J. F. Holman and Walton & Walton for plaintiff.

Messrs. Merrill & Coffin for defendants.

Peters, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question is whether, in an action on a penal bond given in bastardy proceedings, the judgment should be for the penalty, and damages be assessed so far as they have accrued at the time of the assessment, future damages to be recovered by after-process of scire facias, or whether judgment must be given, once for all, for all the damages that will ever be sustained, both past and prospective, where the liability of the principal in the bond is by the order of court a continuing liability.

We are of the opinion that the first named is the proper procedure. We are induced to give an explanation for such opinion, on account of some adverse expressions on the point, to be found in our own cases.

The decision of the question depends on the construction to be given to a section of our statutes, and upon the scope and effect of such section, in view of the equity powers anciently accorded to courts of law, in this branch of practice. The section referred to (Rev. Stat. chap. 82, § 82) is as follows: "In actions on bond or contract in a penal sum, for the performance of covenants or agreements, . . . when the jury finds the condition broken, they shall estimate the plaintiff's damages, and judgment shall be entered for the penal sum, and execution shall issue for such damages and costs."

This provision applies to actions on bonds containing a penal clause, where there may be breaches of the bond at different times. The portion of the section which requires a judgment for the penalty does not apply to a bond conditioned to pay a single sum on a day certain, because in such case there can be but one breach and one assessment, and no necessity exists for retaining the penalty as a security for future breaches; but, even in such case, a judgment for the penalty would not be injurious to any party, and such (merely inaccurate) judgments are to be seen occasionally on our records.

Nor does the Statute extend to certain statutory bonds, bail-bonds, recognizances, bonds for good behavior, bonds to do or not to do some collateral act and the like. These bonds and some others are not money or business bonds, and are not conditioned for the security of covenants and agreements in the sense of the Statute, and can be chancery by the court with much more propriety than by a jury.

In Philbrook v. Burgess, 52 Me. 271, although the case was correctly decided, we think an erroneous opinion was expressed. That was an action of debt upon a bond which, by its terms, was to be void on condition that the defendant should maintain the plaintiff during her life. The jury were allowed to assess such damages as had accrued up to the date of the verdict, the defendant contending that damages should not have been assessed for any dereliction beyond the date of the writ. The defendant's exceptions were correctly overruled, but the court took occasion to say in the opinion that even more damages might have been legally assessed, and that all past and prospective damages should have been assessed, and that the bond did not come within the Statute, for the reason that the defendant was not a party to, and personally bound by, some agreement outside of and separate from the condition of the bond itself. The decisions do not sustain that position. Much reliance was placed in the opinion upon the reasoning of the court in Hathaway v. Crosby, 17 Me. 448. But in the latter case the argument of the court was merely to the effect that a poor debtor's bond was not a bond in any sense securing a covenant or agreement, and that the damages should be assessed by the court, instead of by the jury, for its forfeiture. That was undoubtedly a statutory bond which, at that day, belonged to a class of obligations not coming within the particular Statute in question.

No heed was paid in Miller v. Miller, 64 Me. 484, to the rule advocated in Philbrook v. Burgess, supra, and judgment was entered up for the penalty of a bond given by order of court for the support of certain parties, the support to be furnished by installments, although there was no covenant or agreement except the mere condition of the bond in common form.

The case of Brett v. Murphy, 80 Me. 358, 6 New Eng. Rep. 648, was an action on a bastardy bond, where judgment was entered for the past and estimated future damages, and not for the penal sum. But no attention was bestowed upon the point further than following without challenge the form of procedure indicated in Philbrook v. Burgess, supra. And the case now before us is also reported in the same volume (Corson v. Dunlap, 80 Me. 354, 6 New Eng. Rep. 718), where it was ordered that judgment be entered for the penal sum, the cases accidentally standing opposed to each other.

The original legislation on this form of procedure, from which our own Statute was in great measure copied, was Stat. 8 and 9 Wm. III. chap. 11, § 8, passed nearly two centuries ago. The Act, a very long one, and in that respect within the fashion of its day, extends its provisions "in all actions upon any bond or bonds, or on any penal sum, for non-performance of any covenants or agreements, in any indenture, deed or writing contained." In Tidd's Practice it is said, citing cases in approval of the statement, that this Statute was made in favor of defendants, was intended to be highly remedial and has received a very liberal construction. The author further says that where covenants or agreements are contained "in the condition of a bond,"—that is, implied by the condition,—they are held to be within the Statute, just as much as where they are in a different instrument. This construction was strongly maintained by Lord Mansfield, in 1759, in Collins v. Collins, 2 Burr. 820. In that case the penalty of the bond was to be forfeited if the defendant did not support the plaintiff and pay him a small sum annually during his life. There was no covenant or agreement outside of the bond, and none in it except such as was inferable from a penal clause and condition in ordinary form. There was no personal promise. It was there objected that the Statute of William did not apply, because the action was not brought upon a penalty for non-performance of an agreement or covenant contained in any indenture, deed or writing. Lord Mansfield is reported as making this reply: "This [bond] is an agreement between the parties, and an agreement in writing. The condition of the bond is an agreement in writing; and people have frequently gone into courts of equity, upon conditions of bonds, as being agreements in writing, to have a specific performance of them."

The law has ever since stood as Lord Mansfield enunciated it. We do not find that the Statute has been differently interpreted where the point has been directly presented for the decision of any court. Of course, there have been numerous cases where it has been controverted whether a particular bond involves the subject matter of an agreement or not, either expressly or by implication. But we think no modern case requires, in order to bring a bond within the Statute, such as our own is, that the covenant or agreement shall be an express personal obligation of the maker. The text-books, digests and law dictionaries seem uniformly to express the same view. In Gainsford v. Griffith, 1 Saund. 58, note, Mansfield's doctrine is accepted, and it is there said that the Statute was meant to meet cases where covenants are to be performed at different times, or moneys to be paid by installments. The question pending in the present case, though on different facts, arose in Marvin v. Bell, 41 Vt. 607, and it is there held in a clear and cogent discussion, that the condition in the bond, in its legal effect and operation, amounts to an agreement,—is its equivalent.

Mr. Bishop, in his work on Contracts, § 1458, aptly describes the English legislation, and its effect, in the following: "For shortening the processes of justice, in 1697, the English Statute of 8 and 9 Wm. III. chap. 11, § 8, provided that, on a recovery of judgment for a penal sum in any court of record, inquiry should be made by a jury as to the amount of damages suffered from breaches which had already transpired, on payment whereof the judgment should simply remain a security against further breaches. And on there being such, the actual damage should, on scire facias, be in like manner ascertained. Then, in 1705, it was enacted by 4 Anne, chap. 16, § 18, that, in an action on a bond with a penalty for the payment of money, if the defendant shall bring into the court where the action shall be depending all the principal money and interest due on such bond, and also all such costs as have been expended in any suit or suits in law or equity upon such bond, the said money so brought in shall be deemed and taken to be in full satisfaction and discharge of said bond. The date of these Statutes is subsequent to the earliest settlements in this country; still, being highly remedial and beneficial, they were accepted as common law in Maryland and Pennsylvania and, it is believed, in nearly all of our other States. And there has been more or less American legislation to the like effect." Massachusetts and Maine were governed by legislation of their own of similar effect. Bailey v. Rogers, 1 Me. 186, 190.

But these Acts had been preceded by the judicial thought. The courts had in great measure adopted devices to the same end before these Acts were passed; and, although at first the practice was to invoke the aid of a chancery court for the purpose, courts of law had gradually taken the power to chancery bonds and relieve against penalties into their own hands. Though in ancient days judgment would go for the penalty of a bond, motions were resorted to, to restrain the collection of more money than a plaintiff was equitably entitled to. Many authorities illustrating the old practice are cited in Paine and Duer's Practice and in Tidd's Practice under the head of Judgment. Both before and after the Statute of Anne, the practice was to allow the defendant, on his motion, to bring the whole amount of the penalty into court, and the proceedings were thereupon stayed. The plaintiff would receive only the amount of the principal, interest and costs; and, if this did not consume the amount of the penalty, the defendant was allowed to take out the remainder. It was denominated "an equitable motion to be relieved against the penalty." Gregg's Case, 2 Salk. 596. And see cases cited in note in 3 Parsons, Cont. 6th ed. *157.

And in no class of cases was the privileged proceeding more invoked than in instances of bonds given to a parent or a parish against the burden of a bastard child. In Wilde v. Clarkson, 6 T. R. 808, which was an action brought on a bond given for indemnity against expense that might be suffered by reason of the then expected birth of a bastard child, Lord Kenyon, Ch. J., permitted the penalty to be paid into court, and, in the course of his opinion, remarked: "Suppose the plaintiff proceeds in this action, the judgment would be for the penalty of the bond, and one shilling nominal damages for the detention of the debt. In actions on bonds or on any penal sums for performance of covenants, etc., the Act of Parliament expressly says that there shall be judgment for the penalty, and that the judgment shall stand as a security for further breaches." The only agreement in that case was the bond itself.

In Massachusetts, where the Statute is substantially like our own, the practice accords with our view on this question. McGrath v. Conway, 116 Mass. 860, and Barnes v. Chase, 128 Mass. 211, are cases where judgment was given for the penalty in bastardy bonds, and damages were assessed for so much as was due at the date of assessment under the order of court. See Batley v. Holbrook, 11 Gray, 212.

In Sevey v. Blacklin, 2 Mass. 541, the court used this language: "When it shall appear in the court that the penalty is forfeited, then the equity powers of the court commence, and the judges are authorized to enter judgment for so much money as in equity and good conscience the plaintiff can claim, unless the condition of the bond be such that further damages may arise to him by future breaches. In such case judgment is rendered for the penalty, and execution is awarded for the damages already accrued, and the judgment is to stand as a security for future damages to be recovered by scire facias." There could not be, in our judgment, a better statement of the law than the above. The procedure ordained or approved by the Statute should apply where it is fitting.

And such was the intention of the English Act, and of our own Act. Its meaning is greater than its words. The bond itself is a covenant or agreement in all cases where the procedure fittingly applies. The bond does, in effect, contain a covenant or agreement, though there be no remedy except by a suit on the bond; it implies an agreement, assumes one. It is the nature of the condition which decides whether the Statute attaches to the bond or not. Some judge has said, a promise may be considered as implied from the joint effect of condition and penalty. We are to look at the nature and reason of the thing. What difference of procedure should there be, in an action on the bond, whether it be conditioned to secure a written promise or only an oral promise, as long as the penalty assures that the promise will be kept? The penalty is the effectual security, not the promise. What difference should it make, in assessing damages under a bond, whether the defendant is also liable for the same cause in some other form of action or not? What difference should there be, in assessing damages in a conditional judgment on mortgage, whether the mortgage secures written promises or merely certain sums named in the conditional clause? What difference can there be whether a penal bond be given to secure a judgment of court based on a promise or a judgment based on a tort? The judgment is as definite in the one case as the other. The Statute was intended to have a wide and beneficent, and not narrow, operation.

The rule we acted upon is not only the true exposition of the Statute, but is equitable and just for all cases, and especially beneficial to both parties in the present case. If the plaintiff have a full allowance at once, there are chances that it would be improvidently expended. If the assessment of prospective damages be made in advance of the needs of the plaintiff, the defendant may be required to pay a much larger sum than may turn out to be necessary. Payment of damages as often as damages accrue is in accordance with the original order of court, with the policy of the law, and adapted to the situation of the parties.

We regard this a suitable opportunity for changing the rule of practice followed in this State since the case of Philbrook v. Burgess, supra, so far as it is inconsistent with the present decision, inasmuch as no principle touching the title to property is affected by the change, and the ruling made below is not overruled thereby. After the present case has been published that case will not govern us as an authority on the point involved in this discussion.

Exceptions overruled.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

G. H. DUGAN et al., Appts.,

v.
C. W. LEWIS et al.

1. The rate of interest on a contract between citizens of different States may be fixed according to the law of either State.
2. The law of Texas governs the rate of interest on notes secured by a trust deed given for money borrowed in New York, where the bargain was made and the money and papers delivered to and by an agent on behalf of a citizen of Texas, who signed and dated the papers in the latter State, if the stipulated rate of interest would have been usurious in New York, but not in Texas, and the deed of trust provides that the contract shall be construed according to the law of the State of Texas, where the same is made.

3. A stipulation in a deed of trust to secure notes and interest coupons, that in default of any payment the whole sum of money secured shall become due at the lender's option, is to be construed as a penalty, and will not be enforced except upon the cancellation of unearned interest notes, and therefore it does not make the contract usurious.

(January 12, 1891.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the District Court for Grayson County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to restrain the enforcement of a deed of trust for breach of the conditions of the contract, the performance of which it secured, upon the alleged ground that the contract was tainted with usury. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. W. Finley, for appellant Dugan:

NOTE.—As to law governing question of usury in contracts made in one State to be performed in another, see Martin v. Johnson, 8 L. R. A. 170, and note, 24 Ga. 421.

The stipulations in the deed in trust authorizing the lender to declare the notes due on failure to pay installments of interest render the contract usurious.

Messrs. Brown & Bliss and E. C. McLean, for appellant the City Bank of Sherman:

The two notes aggregating $750 payable to C. W. Lewis, although dated as in Texas, and signed in Texas, were under the facts in this case made in New York.

Those notes, as well as the note for $5,000 payable to the American Freehold Land & Mortgage Company, were New York contracts, governed and controlled by the law of New York as to usury, and each of said notes and the deed of trust to secure the same were by the laws of said State absolutely void.

Messrs. Brown & Hall and A. T. Watts for appellees.

Henry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

G. H. Dugan, who at the time was a resident citizen of the State of Texas, acting through an agent in the State of New York, borrowed from the American Freehold Land & Mortgage Company, of London, Eng., the sum of $5,000. Dugan executed his note in favor of the mortgage company for said sum, payable at the office of the Corbin Banking Company in New 12 L. R. A.

York City five years after date, with interest from date at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, for which five coupon notes were attached to said note. The note contained a stipulation for the payment of 10 per cent attorneys' fees if it should be collected by suit, and another making the principal of the note become due, at the option of the holder thereof, upon the failure to pay any installment within thirty days after it should become due. Dugan, to secure said note, executed a deed of trust upon land in Texas, in which one Sherwood, the agent in New York of the lender, was made trustee. The agreement to lend the money was made in the State of New York, and the deed of trust and the note were delivered to the lender in that State. The $5,000 was paid to Dugan's agent in the State of New York. The note and coupons and the deed of trust were dated and signed by Dugan in the State of Texas. The deed of trust contained the following clauses:

"Upon the failure of the borrower to pay said note, or either of said coupons, or failure to comply with any of the stipulations contained in the said deed of trust, the whole sum of money secured thereby may without notice to the borrower, at the option of the lender or his assigns, and at his option only, be declared due and payable at once."

"The contracts embodied in this conveyance, and the notes secured hereby, shall in all other respects be construed according to the laws of the State of Texas, where the same is made."

At the date of these transactions the rate of interest in the State of New York was 6 per cent and the reservation of a greater rate rendered the contract void. Dugan made default in the payment of interest, and the whole amount was declared due. Out of the $5,000 the sum of $2,135.66 was used without its reaching Dugan's hands, to pay off a prior mortgage upon the land. For the purpose of paying the Corbin Banking Company for its services in procuring the loan, Dugan executed two other notes, and secured them by a second deed of trust upon the same land,—one for $300, the other for $450, both bearing 10 per cent interest from date. They were both executed and delivered in Texas. They were made payable to C. W. Lewis, who resided in Texas, at the office of the Corbin Banking Company in the State of New York. Lewis had no pecuniary interest in these notes, and he transferred them to the Corbin Banking Company. This suit was brought by appellants to restrain the enforcement of the deed of trust on the ground that the contracts are governed by the laws of the State of New York and are therefore usurious and void. The cause was tried without a jury; and the court, upon a finding of facts from which we have taken the foregoing statement, rendered judgment in favor of the defendants.

The subject of the conflict of laws of interest and usury as affecting the enforcement of contracts has been much discussed, and opinions have conflicted, sometimes as to the law, and at others as to the effect of different conditions of fact.

In the case of Connor v. Donnell, 55 Tex. 174, this court said: "If a note sued on be made in New York, and be also expressly made payable at a point in that State, then the question of usury will be controlled by the law in New York. It is believed that no authority can be adduced to the contrary."

We find a very great number of authorities announcing the same doctrine upon a like state of facts. This case contains also the following language: "Although a note be actually made and indorsed by citizens of Texas in New York, and be there discounted by a citizen of New York at a rate lawful in Texas, but usurious in New York, if by the date and tenor of the note it appears that the parties intended to make it payable in Texas, and contracted with reference to the laws of Texas, the courts of this State follow the authorities which hold such a note valid."—citing Bullard v. Thompson, 35 Tex. 319; Depau v. Humphreys, 8 Mart. N. S. 1, and Chapman v. Robertson, 6 Paige, 627, 3 L. ed. 1128. The two cases last named have been much discussed and doubted and opposed by courts whose decisions would hold the contract now under consideration obnoxious to the charge of usury. Both cases are criticised, and their correctness questioned, by Story in his work on the Conflict of Laws. The Louisiana case is stated by him as follows: "The note was given in New Orleans, payable in New York, for a large sum of money, bearing an interest of 10 per cent, being the legal interest of Louisiana, the New York legal interest being 7 per cent only. The question was whether the note was tainted with usury, and therefore void, as it would be if made in New York. The Supreme Court of Louisiana decided that it was not usurious; and that, although the note was made payable at New York, yet the interest might be stipulated for, either according to the law of Louisiana, or according to that of New York." Page 407. The Supreme Court of the United States has approved this doctrine in the cases of Miller v. Tiffany, 66 U. S. 1 Wall. 298, 17 L. ed. 540, and Cromwell v. Sac County, 96 U. S. 62, 24 L. ed. 687. In the case last mentioned the opinion contains the following expression: "When the rate of interest at the place of contract differs from the rate at the place of payment, the parties may contract for either rate, and the contract will govern."—citing the above-named cases, and also Peck v. Mayo, 14 Vt. 38, and Butters v. Olds, 11 Iowa, 1.

In the case of Bullard v. Thompson, 35 Tex. 319, it was said by this court: "They [the notes] were dated at Matagorda, Tex., and, whether they were actually executed in New York or in Texas, it is evident that the parties intended them to be paid in accordance with the laws of Texas; otherwise it would seem that they had voluntarily entered into a contract within the State of New York to be executed in accordance with its laws, when the contract was within itself repugnant thereto."

The case of Chapman v. Robertson, as stated by Story, was as follows: "A citizen of New York applied in England to a British subject for a loan of money upon the security of a bond and mortgage upon land in New York at the legal rate of interest (7 per cent) of that State, and it was agreed that the borrower should, upon his return to New York, execute the bond and mortgage, and duly record the same, and upon the bond and mortgage being received in England the lender agreed to deposit the money loaned at the bankers of the borrower in London for his use; and the bond and mortgage were executed and received, and the money paid accordingly to the bankers. The question arose whether the transaction was usurious or not, and that depended upon the law of the place by which it was to be governed, whether by the law of England (where interest is only 5 per cent) or by the law of New York. It was held by the court that the contract was to be construed according to the laws of New York, and therefore that a bill to foreclose the mortgage, filed in New York, was maintainable, and that the Law of Usury of England was no defense to the suit. On that occasion the learned chancellor said that, as no place of payment was mentioned in the bond or mortgage, the legal construction of the contract was that the money was to be paid where the obligee resided, or wherever he might be found; that, the residence of the obligee being in England at the time of the execution of the bond, that must be considered the place of payment, for the purpose of determining the question where that part of the contract was to be performed, and that the execution of the bond in New York did not make it a personal contract there, because it was inoperative until received in England, and the money deposited with the bankers for the borrower; and he concluded by saying: "Upon a full examination of all the cases to be found upon the subject, either in this country or in England, none of which, however, appear to have decided the precise question which arises in this cause, I have arrived at the conclusion that this mortgage, executed here, and upon property in this State, being valid by the lex situs, which is also the law of domicile of the mortgagor, it is the duty of this court to give full effect to the security, without reference to the Usury Laws of England, which neither party intended to evade or violate by the execution of a mortgage upon the lands here." Story, Conf. L. pp. 400, 401. In the opinion itself it is further said: "No doubt appears to have been entertained as to the validity of a loan upon a bond and mortgage actually executed in Ireland or the colonies, though the loan itself was made in England, and was made payable there to a mortgagee who resided there." "Here the verbal contract for a loan upon the security of a mortgage upon lands in this State was wholly inoperative until the mortgage and other written security were executed in this State. It was a contract made partly in this State and partly in England; and being actually made with reference to our laws, and to the rate of interest allowed here, it must be governed by them in the construction and effect of the contract as to its validity." 6 Paige, 631-634, 3 L. ed. 1181, 1132. If it be admitted that, in the absence of an express stipulation as to the place of the payment of the debt, it was payable at the residence of the obligor in New York, instead of the residence of the payee in England, the principle of the decision will not be affected, as it was expressly placed upon the ground that the debt was payable in England. The case decided was that a debt contracted in England by a resident of New York, payable in England, and the money received there by the borrower, secured by a note and deed of trust upon land in the State of New York, which were signed in that State, but delivered to the lender in England, and stipulating for a rate of interest lawful in New York, but usurious in England, was valid and enforceable in a court of New York. The case decided was in every material respect similar to the one now before us. See Kilgore v. Dempsey, 25 Ohio St. 416; Townsend v. Riley, 46 N. H. 806; Fitch v. Remer, 1 Biss. 337.

In the case of Arnold v. Potter, 23 Iowa, 195, the plaintiff, who was a resident of the State of Massachusetts, sued the defendant, who resided in Iowa, upon a debt contracted in the State of Massachusetts, and payable in the State of New York, for a rate of interest usurious in both of said States, but lawful in Iowa. The notes and trust deed were delivered in the State of Massachusetts, and the money was received there by the borrower. The defendant pleaded usury, and contended that the contract was to be governed either by the laws of New York or Massachusetts. The plaintiff contended that it was an Iowa contract, and made in good faith, with reference to her laws. The supreme court approved the following charge given by the judge of the district court: "If defendant went to Boston and urged the loan, and promised 10 per cent under the laws of Iowa, and all the arrangements and contracts were made as to the laws of Iowa in good faith, and no more than 10 per cent was contracted for, then the defense fails, and plaintiff can recover. If the parties in good faith loaned and borrowed the money sued for, with a full understanding that the law of Iowa was to govern as to the interest, then the laws of New York and Massachusetts can have no influence here, but the understanding of the parties must prevail." In the opinion of the supreme court it is said: "Parties may in good faith contract with reference to the place where the payor resides, and where the property upon which the security is taken is located."

In Randolph on Commercial Paper it is said: "If the money is employed on the land mortgaged, and borrowed for that purpose, it has been held that the lex loci rei sita should apply." Vol. 1, p. 23. And see Wharton, Conf. L. § 510; Fitch v. Remer, supra.

We readily concur in the rule announced by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the doctrine of the cases cited, which are in entire harmony with it. The doctrine established that a citizen of one State, contracting a debt with a citizen of another, may make the interest according to the law of either, the solution of such a case as the one now before us cannot long be doubtful; for, the contracting parties having the right to enforce their own wishes on the subject, the mere form of manifesting their purpose cannot be treated as of importance. There is no reason why their making their contract in one State instead of in the other, nor why their making it payable in one State instead of in the other, should have a controlling influence over the question. Doing either will, in the absence of other evidence, serve to show their purpose and control the result. But not so when they otherwise distinctly provide, or when from other facts their intention can be more satisfactorily ascertained. It must be kept in view that Usury Laws cannot be evaded under cover of naming a State whose laws shall control the contract. It is difficult, however, to conceive how that result can ever proceed from the State of the actual residence of the debtor being named. The difficulty is emphasized when the right of the parties to contract with reference to the laws of that State is conceded, without there being any difficulty on the subject except the method of developing the intention. It is not entirely clear to us that the language contained in the deed of trust, that "the contracts embodied in this conveyance, and the notes secured hereby, shall in all other respects be construed by the laws of the State of Texas, where the same is made," has reference to the rate of interest, except in a general way. The question as it is involved in this case can hardly be said to be a question of the construction of the contracts. We think, however, that the expression should be taken as a circumstance to be considered in ascertaining and giving effect to the intention of the parties to the contracts.

It is contended that as the deed of trust provides that on failure of the borrower to pay said note, or either of said coupons, or failure to comply with any of the stipulations contained in said deed of trust, the whole sum of money secured thereby may without notice to the borrower, at the option of the lender or his assigns, and at his option only, be declared due and payable at once, and the trustee was authorized to take possession and sell the land; and as default was made in the payment of the coupon due December 1, 1887, and the whole amount was declared due, the whole five years' interest became collectible, according to the terms of the contract, long before the termination of the five years, thus making the interest reserved greater on the happening of the contingency than 12 per cent per annum, and the contract usurious under the laws of this State. We do not think that a correct construction of the contract will make a greater amount of interest due and collectible upon it than shall have accrued on the principal, calculated up to the date of collection at the rate named in the note, or, in other words, that any unearned interest comes within the proper meaning of the stipulation. In any event, we agree with the conclusion of the judge before whom the cause was tried, that said stipulation "is to be construed as a penalty, which will not be enforced except upon canceling the unearned interest notes, and that it does not make the contract usurious."

We find no error in the proceedings, and the judgment is affirmed.

NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

William ELL, Resp't.,

v.

NORTHERN PACIFIC R. CO., Appt.

(....N. Dak....)

*1. The negligence of the foreman of a gang in failing to block a pile which was shoved against plaintiff, injuring him, because it was not blocked, is the negligence of a fellow servant although the foreman had authority to employ and discharge plaintiff, and the plaintiff was under his superintendence and control in doing the work in the performance of which he was injured.

2. Whether a negligent servant is the fellow servant of an employé who is injured by the carelessness of the former depends, not upon the relative ranks of the two servants, but upon the character of the work, the negligence with respect to which resulted in the injury.

3. The negligent performance or omission to perform a duty which the master owes to his employé is at common law the negligence of the master, whatever the grade of the servant who is in that respect careless. The negligence of a servant engaged in the same general business with the injured servant is the negligence of a fellow servant, whatever position the former occupies with respect to the latter, as to all acts which pertain to the duties of a mere servant, as contradistinguished from the duties of the master to his employé.

4. In actions for damages for negligence, interest may be awarded or withheld in the discretion of the jury.

(January 15, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Stutsman County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting from negligence for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John S. Watson, for appellant:

From Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp., 4 Met. 49, has sprung the doctrine of the master's exemption from liability for injury to one servant by the negligence of another in the same service.

In Herbert v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 3 Dak. 88, affirmed, 116 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 755, the true rule was declared by which it may always be ascertained whether the culpable employé is a fellow servant within the rule, viz.: by considering the character of the act or omission with respect to which negligence is alleged. If such act or omission pertain to the performance of a duty which the master owed absolutely to his servant, than he cannot escape liability by delegating its performance to another.

NOTE.—Master, when liable for negligence of co-servant acting under authority.

Where the negligent act of one servant causes injury to another, as the result of the exercise of the authority conferred upon him by the master over the servant injured, the master is liable. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Wombacher, 134 Ill. 57, citing Chicago & A. R. Co. v. May, 108 Ill. 238; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Hawk, 10 West. Rep. 127, 131 Ill. 259; North Chicago R. Mill Co. v. Johnson, 114 Ill. 57; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. 377, 28 L. ed. 787; Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 647, 29 L. ed. 755; Thompson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 14 Fed. Rep. 554.

As regards the liability of the master, there is no difference between an act of a fellow servant that causes an injury and a command that produces the same result. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Blohm, 4 L. R. A. 764, 78 Tex. 637. See Robinson v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. 46 Tex. 541.

A vice-principal or foreman represents the principal so far only as his act is the act of the principal, and so long as he is in discharge of the duties which the principal owes to his employé, and not as to anything which it is not the duty of the principal to do. Ross v. Walker (Pa.) 27 W. N. C. 165, 169. See Patterson v. Pittsburg & C. R. Co. 78 Pa. 389; Mullan v. Philadelphia & S. Mail S. Co. 78 Pa. 25; Pennsylvania & N. Y. C. R. Co. v. Mason, 109 Pa. 296; Lewis v. Seifert, 9 Cent. Rep. 751, 116 Pa. 622; Bier v. Standard Mfg. Co. 130 Pa. 446.

A foreman of a gang is a vice-principal, if he is vested with the entire management, control and supervision of the particular work; but where he is working side by side with the other men, merely leading the work and giving immediate direction to it and to the men, sometimes in the presence of another person as superintendent, he is merely a fellow servant. Lindvall v. Woods, 44 Fed. Rep. 555.

of a work train and all the trainmen, with power to employ and discharge them, is, in respect to the movements of the train, a fellow servant of a section hand on the train who is injured by a collision. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Smith, 78 Tex. 611.

The master is not liable for injuries caused to a servant by a defective structure, appliance or instrumentality, where the furnishing and preparation of it is itself part of the work which the servant is employed to perform, though such injuries may arise from the negligence of another servant employed upon a branch of such work differing from that of the injured servant. Fraser v. Red River Lumber Co. 43 Minn. 520. See Foster v. Minnesota Cent. R. Co. 14 Minn. 380; Collins v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. 30 Minn. 31; Brown v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 31 Minn. 553; Roberts v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 33 Minn. 313; Lindvall v. Woods, 4 L. R. A. 793, 41 Minn. 212.

Although the foreman of a mill may not be the fellow servant of a person working in the mill so far as the matter of providing safe and sound machinery is concerned, he is a fellow servant while actually engaged with him in sawing. Sayward v. Carlson (Wash.) Jan. 29, 1890. See Quincy Min. Co. v. Kitts, 43 Mich. 34; Sell v. Riets & Bro. Lumber Co. 70 Mich. 479.

Where a workman on a railroad grade was injured by the falling of a trestle upon which he was working, it was held that all the workmen on the grade, including the foreman, were fellow servants. Lindvall v. Woods, 4 L. R. A. 793, 41 Minn. 212. See Kelley v. Norcross, 121 Mass. 508; Colton v. Richards, 123 Mass. 484; Killea v. Faxon, 125 Mass. 485; Peschel v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 62 Wis. 338; Gallagher v. Piper, 16 C. B. N. S. 609.

Fellow servants, who are. See notes to Brennan v. Gordon (N. Y.) 8 L. R. A. 518; Hunn v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. (Mich.) 7 L. R. A. 500; Lindvall v. Woods (Minn.) 4 L. R. A. 793.

The superior servant may, as in fact he usually does, fulfill a dual function,—that of representing the master in the performance of certain personal duties incumbent upon the latter, and also the performance of other work in common with other employes.

Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co. 110 Mass. 241; Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. 100 U. S. 219, 25 L. ed. 615.

While it is just and proper to impose liability upon the master for the negligent performance of the first-named duties, no good reason can be assigned for its imposition in the latter instance.

See McKinney, Fellow Servants, §§ 111-167, p. 118, and authorities cited; Dillon, Am. Law Concerning Employer's Liability, 24 Am. Law Rev. p. 175. See also Crispin v. Babbitt, 81 N. Y. 516; Hofnagle v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 55 N. Y. 608; Murphy v. Boston & A. R. Co. 59 How. Pr. 197; Hanrathy v. Northern Cent. R. Co. 46 Md. 280; *Zeigler v. The master cannot be held liable for the negligent use by competent servants of tools and proper appliances, sufficient in themselves and in proper repair, in cases where their use does not involve the performance of some personal duty of the master.

The true test in all cases as to whether the negligent servant is a vice-principal is, Was the act with respect to which he was negligent one which he was employed to do for and in the place of the master?

Gunter v. Graniteville Mfg. Co. 18 S. C. 262; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 1041.

Mr. S. L. Glaspell, for respondent:

Even if the affirmance of the judgment in this case can only be had by a full and unqualified adoption by this court of the fellow-servant rule, the court will then follow the Supreme Court of the United States and every State Supreme Court which has passed upon the question as an original proposition since 1884, when Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. 377, 28 L. ed. 787, was decided and the superior-servant limitation given a full and unqualified adoption by the highest court in this country.

By the clear weight of authority it is now 19 L. R. A.

held that the general rule, that the master is exempt from liability to one servant for an injury caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, does not apply where the injured servant is inferior in rank to the one by whose negligence he is injured, and is under the direction and control of such other and is bound to obey his orders.

In some States where the superior-servant limitation is denied it is conceded that where a foreman has the power of employing, directing and discharging the men under him, he is a vice-principal.

It was clearly the duty of Withnell, having charge of a crew of men performing a dangerous work in a dangerous place, to provide for their safety. This was an obligation of the Company which it had delegated to him.

Ell was working in a dangerous place by reason of the orders and directions of his foreman. It was not a mere careless act done by the foreman in performing his work as a co-laborer or fellow servant, but it was a negligent and unskillful exercise of authority over the men in his charge, which caused the injury complained of.

Corliss, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This litigation has its origin in an injury sustained by plaintiff while in the employ of the defendant. He, with several others, was engaged in removing long piles from a platform car to bents on the north side of the defendant's track. These bents were heavy timbers resting on piles driven in the ground, and running at right angles with the track, and the ends nearest to the track were about five feet therefrom. They were the same height as the platform of the car. At the time the accident occurred they were covered over with piles to within two feet from the ends nearest to the track. The piles were rolled from the car to the bents over two round skids about eight inches in diameter, one end of each of which rested upon a pile on the car, and the other upon the pile on the bents which was nearest to the track. Both ends of the skids were on the same level. Reaching from the platform of the car to the ends of the bents were boards a foot wide, over which the men passed from the car to the bents in rolling the piles along over the skids to the bents. In transferring the piles from the car, some of the men rolled them with their hands, and others used cant-hooks in the work. One of the piles which was being removed from the car rolled from the ends of the skids into the space between the pile on the bents nearest to the track and the next pile, and pushed the latter pile towards the plaintiff, and upon his leg, breaking the same near the ankle. One of the grounds upon which plaintiff based and seeks to sustain his recovery was the alleged negligence of the foreman of the gang at work in failing to block this pile so as to prevent its being shoved towards the plaintiff. That the pile was not blocked at the end where plaintiff was working appears to be undisputed. There was evidence to show that the foreman was notified of this fact before the accident. While he denies this, yet there was sufficient evidence to warrant a jury in finding the fact against his testimony. We are clear that the jury were authorized, under the evidence, to find that plaintiff was injured by reason of the negligence of the foreman, Withnell, in failing to block the pile. Will the law hold the defendant responsible for this negligence? Against such liability, defendant invokes the fellow-servant rule, and our Statute embodying it. To escape the force of this rule, plaintiff contends that the case is brought within the scope of the superior-servant limitation to the fellow-servant rule, and that such limitation has the voice of weightier authority, of better reason and of more numerous precedents in its behalf. This issue of law we are to determine, and our investigation must run along the line of general principles; for the adjudications upon this subject,—so multitudinous as almost to warrant the simile, “thick as autumnal leaves that strew the brooks in Vallambrosa,”—these adjudications are so discordant, enumerating so many rules, stating so many limitations, applying the law to facts so diverse, that one is reminded of Gibbon's remark upon the infinite variety of laws and opinions when Justinian entered upon the reform of condification,—that they were beyond the power of any capacity to digest. We are compelled to decide whether this superior-servant limitation shall be adopted in this State. The trial court declared it to be the law in his charge to the jury, and refused to charge against the adoption of the doctrine, although requested to so charge by defendant's counsel. Whatever other ground of liability there may have been, the verdict cannot stand if the trial judge erred in this respect, for the verdict may rest entirely upon the ground-work of such instruction.

The foreman, Withnell, through whose negligence it is insisted that plaintiff was injured, had control of the gang employed on the work, and was vested with authority to employ and discharge the men, who were subject to his direction and supervision. Hence it is urged that he was in his position, and therefore, in the prosecution of the work of unloading these piles, a vice-principal, and not a fellow servant. In this connection the authorities are cited which sustain the doctrine that the station of the employé, and not the character of the act, determines the question whether the master is responsible. In many of the cases where the superior-servant limitation was applied, such servant was in fact the fellow servant of the employé injured. But, because of some superior position occupied by him with respect to the servant injured, the master was, by a legal fiction, regarded as personally present in the person of the superior servant, and made responsible to one servant for the manner in which another servant performed the duties and labors pertaining to a servant's employment. Here lies the difference between the two rules. Those cases which preserve the fellow-servant rule in its full integrity bring the facts of each case to the test, not of the rank of the negligent servant, but of the character of the negligence from which damage results. Did the master owe to his servant a duty as master? Answer the inquiry in the affirmative, and he cannot escape a careless discharge of that duty by shifting the burden to the shoulders of a servant, however inferior his position may be. The negligence of a fellow servant has not wrought injury in such a case. It is the negligence of the master himself, because that was carelessly done which he was bound to have carefully performed. The master must use due care in supplying his servants with safe appliances, and in providing them a safe place in which to work. These are duties of the master. They are none the less his duties because from the necessities of business, or for other reasons, he confides their discharge to an employé. His personal negligence in this respect would create liability. He cannot gain exemption from negligence of another in this regard by delegating these personal duties to another. This doctrine is sound, and it in no manner is a limitation of the fellow-servant rule. On the other hand, the other doctrine is a limitation—a very important limitation—of that rule. It finds no warrant in the cases which first enunciated that rule. It rests on no subsequent legislation; and we are firm in the conviction that the mere superiority in the rank of the negligent servant—his right to control the servant injured, and to employ and to discharge him—calls for no modification of the fellow-servant rule. The bed-rock of that doctrine is that every employé assumes the risk of his co-employé's negligence as one of the ordinary risks of his work. Is a superintendent or foreman so much more careless in the performance of work pertaining to a servant's duties than a subordinate employé that the risk of the former's negligence is an extraordinary one? If work belonging to the duties of a servant be done carelessly, what conceivable difference is there whether the negligence proceed from a commander or a subaltern, so long as the master himself is not personally at fault? The superior servant is in fact a fellow servant. The two are engaged in the same general work for the master, one using his muscle chiefly, and the other perhaps working mainly with his brain. The only ground on which the superior's relation as fellow servant is ignored is the constructive presence in his person of the master, because the master in the distribution of labor has appointed him to work in the line of superintendence and control. But this control, this superior rank, cannot lift him above the grade of a fellow servant into the position of a vice-principal so long as he is engaged in the work of a servant only. If a servant of inferior rank should perform the same work, he would not be regarded as the master; and we are at a loss to understand how the higher rank of the servant can change the nature of the act, or increase the risk of the inferior servant, so as to render inapplicable the fellow-servant rule. The superior servant is no more the representative of the master than the inferior servant, except in the enlarged field of his action, and the wider scope of the trusts confided to him. They are both laboring for a common master in the same general business; both ultimately accountable to him and employed, controlled and discharged by him, either personally, or by someone selected by him for that purpose. The ultimate power to employ, control and discharge is in his hands. The reason for the fellow-servant rule applies with full force to the work of a servant, whatever the rank of the servant who performs it. It would be an anomalous condition of the law if the negligence of one servant was within the ordinary risks of the employment, while the negligence of another, no more prone to carelessness, should be without the domain of such risks merely because he had been set in a higher place of service by reason of superior skill or ability.

strong disposition has been manifested to hold the rule not applicable to the case of a servant who at the time of the injury was under the general direction and control of another, who was intrusted with the duties of a higher grade, and from whose negligence the injury resulted. But it cannot be disputed that the negligence of a servant of one grade is as much one of the risks of the business as the negligence of a servant of any other; and it seems impossible, therefore, to hold that the servant contracts to run the risks of negligent acts and omissions on the part of one class of servants, and not those of another class. Nor, on grounds of public policy, could this distinction be admitted, whether we consider the consequences to the parties to the relation exclusively, or those which affect the public, who, in their dealings with the employer, may be subjected to risks. Sound policy seems to require that the law should make it for the interest of the servant that he should take care, not only that he be not negligent himself, but also that any negligence of others in the same employment be properly guarded against by him so far as he may find it reasonably practicable, and be reported to his employer, if needful. And in this regard it can make little difference what is the grade of the servant who is found to be negligent, except as superior authority may render the negligence more dangerous, and consequently increase at least the moral responsibility of any other servant who, being aware of the negligence, should fail to report it." Cooley, Torts, 548. Judge Dillon is equally emphatic against the limitation. He says: "The master owes certain defined, personal, unalienable, nonassignable duties towards servants. These duties may be devolved upon others by the master, but not without recourse on him.

... In the general American law, as I understand it, the doctrine of vice-principal exists to this extent, and no further, viz.: That it is precisely commensurate with the master's personal duties towards his servants. As to these, the servant who represents the master is what we may call for convenience a 'vice-principal,' for whose acts and neglects the master is liable. Beyond this the master is liable only for his own personal negligence. This a plain, sound, safe and practicable line of distinction. We know where to find it, and how to define it. It begins and ends with the personal duties of the master. Any attempt to refine, based upon the notion of 'grades' in the service, or what is much the same thing, distinct 'departments' in the service (which 'departments' frequently exist only in the imagination of the judges, and not in fact), will breed the confusion of the Ohio and Kentucky experiments, whose courts have constructed a labyrinth in which the judges that made it seem to be able to 'find no end; in wandering mazes lost.'

... The real inquiry is, Was the injury caused by another servant one of the ordinary risks of the particular employment? If so, the grade, whether higher, lower, co-ordinate, or the department of the faulty servant, is of no consequence. It is a condition of the contract of service that the servant takes upon himself the risk of accidents in the common course of the business, all open and palpable risks, including the negligence of all fellow servants of whatever grade in the same employment." 24 Am. Law Rev. 175. The superior-servant doctrine unfairly discriminates against masters whose business is of such nature that grades of service are indispensable. This case will furnish an illustration of the truth of this statement. The work with respect to which Withnell, the foreman, was careless—the blocking of the pile—was the work of a servant. Had the same accident occurred in the employ of a master whose servants were all of the same rank, no claim of liability would be thought of. The proprietor of a factory, of a machine-shop, of a mill, of any business in which gradations of service are not absolutely essential, is present in the persons of his servants only so far as his personal duties to his employes are concerned. But the railroad master, though Argus-eyed to discern, and Briarean to prevent, the negligence of its horde of vice-principals,—conductors, as in the Ross Case, 112 U. S. 377, 28 L. ed. 787, superintendents, section bosses, foremen of various gangs and many others,—would find itself impotent to save itself from enormous responsibility not incurred by many other masters, notwithstanding its utmost caution in the selection of its employes. According to this doctrine, the master that has fully discharged all its or his personal duties may be guilty at the same time in as many different places of a score of negligent acts by construction of law, although they are acts pertaining to the duties of a mere servant, performed by one who is in fact a servant, and whose carelessness in this regard can as fairly be said to be within the risks incurred by the injured servant as the carelessness of an employé of lower rank. If there is anything in the reason for the fellow-servant rule, it applies with even stronger force to a class of servants whose higher position is a guaranty of better skill and intelligence, and consequently of the exercise of greater care. Their enlarged responsibility to the master will tend to make them more cautious. Their compensation is frequently so large as to make the retention of their positions very desirable to them. This will augment their caution; for negligent performance of duty would be almost certain to result in their dismissal. There is nothing in the controlling power of the superior servant that warrants any difference in the law; for it cannot be said, as is frequently asserted in cases, that any employé is justified in submitting to the carelessness of a superior from fear of being discharged; and the fact is that it is seldom in the power of the injured servant to anticipate or guard against the careless act of the fellow servant causing injury to him. If he could and did, the accident would not happen. If he could and did not, he would be himself negligent, and his recovery would be defeated. In either case there would be no occasion for the fellow-servant rule. The basis of the fellow-servant doctrine is not that the servant can, as a rule, be on his guard against his co-servants' carelessness, but that he takes the risk of such negligence when he makes his contract of employment. It is said that a servant can exert an influence for care upon a fellow servant of the same grade that he could not exert upon a superior servant by whom he had been employed, and could be discharged, and therefore in the latter case the master is responsible. If this affects the question, then the master should have been held liable, in many cases, where the injured servant could not possibly have exerted any such influence upon the negligent servant. The books are full of such cases, in none of which was the master adjudged responsible. The courts have held that the rule is "not confined to the case of two servants working in company, or having opportunity to control or influence the conduct of each other, but extends to every case in which the two, deriving their authority and their compensation from the same source, are engaged in the same business, though in different departments of duty." Holden v. Fitchburg R. Co. 129 Mass. 263.

Many of the cases holding the master exempt from liability under the fellow-servant rule were, as we have said, cases in which the injured servant could not possibly have exerted influence over the negligent servant. Their separate departments of service, or their usual stations of employment, kept them, as a rule, entirely aloof from each other. In the following cases the relation of fellow servant was held to exist between persons who could exert little, if any, influence over each other: Quebec S. S. Co. v. Merchant, 138 U. S. 875, 33 L. ed. 656,—the carpenter, the porter and stewardess of a steam-ship; St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Welch, 72 Tex. 208, 2 L. R. A. 889,—foreman of a bridge gang, and servants operating train; Elliot v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 5 Dak. 528, 3 L. R. A. 868,—a section foreman and a conductor; Fagundes v. Central Pac. R. Co. 79 Cal. 97, 3 L. R. A. 824,—a laborer employed to remove snow from track and a conductor; Baughman v. Calaveras County Super. Ct. 72 Cal. 573,—a conductor and brakeman; Randall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 109 U. S. 478, 27 L. ed. 1003,—a brakeman and conductor of different trains; Van Wickle v. Manhattan R. Co. 32 Fed. Rep. 278,—a track repairer and an engineer; McMaster v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 65 Miss. 264,—brakeman of one train and employé on another; Naylor v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 38 Fed. Rep. 801,—engineer and switchman; Van Aery v. Union Pac. R. Co. 35 Fed. Rep. 40,—engineers of different trains; Connelly v. Minneapolis & N. R. Co. 38 Minn. 80,—a sectionman and an engineer or brakeman; Howard v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 26 Fed. Rep. 887,—an engineer and fireman of different trains; Houston & T. O. R. Co. v. Rider, 62 Tex. 287; Gormley v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 72 Ind. 81; Collins v. St. Paul & S. O. R. Co. 80 Minn. 81; Clifford v. Old Colony R. Co. 141 Mass. 564, 2 New Eng. Rep. 175; Keys v. Pennsylvania Co. (Pa.) 1 Cent. Rep. 898; Whelan v. Mad River & L. E. R. Co. 8 Ohio St. 249,—in each case an engineer and a sectionman.

Without stating the relation of the injured to the negligent servant in each of the following cases, they are referred to as being in the same line: Holden v. Fitchburg R. Co. 129 Mass. 268; Valter v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 85 Ill. 600; Beal v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 70 N. Y. 171; Brown v. Central Pac. R. Co. (Cal.) 7 Pac. Rep. 447; Roberts v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 33 Minn. 218; Brown v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 31 Minn. 553; Cooper v.

Milwaukee & Pr. du Ch. R. Co. 23 Wis. 668; Haine v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 58 Wis. 526; Copper v. Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. 108 Ind. 805, 1 West. Rep. 287; Henry v. Staten Island R. Co. 81 N. Y. 378; Blake v. Maine Cent. R. Co. 70 Me. 60; Harvey v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 88 N. Y. 481.

The list might be greatly enlarged.

Going back to the fountain, we find this idea of exertion of influence by the injured servant as the basis of the servant rule distinctly repudiated. In the Farwell Case, 4 Met. 60, Chief Justice Shaw says: "It was strongly pressed in the argument that although this might be so where two or more servants are employed in the same department of duty, where each can exert some influence on the conduct of the other, and thus to some extent provide for his security, yet that it could not apply where two or more are employed in different departments of duty at a distance from each other, and where one can in no degree influence or control the conduct of the other. But we think this is founded upon a supposed distinction on which it would be extremely difficult to establish a practical rule. . . . When the object to be accomplished is one and the same, when the employers are the same, and the several persons employed derive their authority and their compensation from the same source, it would be extremely difficult to distinguish what constitutes one department, and what a distinct department, of duty. It would vary with the circumstances of every case. If it were made to depend on the nearness or distance of the persons from each other, the question would immediately arise, How near or how distant must they be to be the same or different departments? Besides, it appears to us that the argument rests upon an assumed principle of responsibility which does not exist. The master in the case supposed is not exempt from liability because the servant has better means of providing for his safety when he is employed in immediate connection with those from whose negligence he might suffer, but because the implied contract of the master does not extend to indemnify the servant against the negligence of anyone but himself; . . . and he is not liable in tort as for the negligence of his servant because the person suffering does not stand towards him in the relation of a stranger, but is one whose rights are regulated by contract, express or implied. The exemption of the master, therefore, from liability for the negligence of a fellow servant does not depend exclusively upon the consideration that the servant has better means to provide for his own safety, but upon other grounds. Hence the separation of the employment into different departments cannot create that liability where it does not arise from express or implied contract, or from a responsibility created by law to third persons and strangers for the negligence of a servant." It is thus apparent that there is nothing in the fact that an inferior servant may not be able to exert any influence for safety over his superior to justify the refusal to apply the fellow-servant rule. On principle, we are opposed to the doctrine of the Ross Case, 112 U. S. 877, 28 L. ed. 787. We believe that the true rule was stated and applied in Crispin v. Babbitt, 81 N. Y. 516: "The liability of the master does not depend upon the grade or rank of the employé whose negligence causes the injury. A superintendent of a factory, although having power to employ men, or represent the master in other respects, is in the management of the machinery a fellow servant of the other operatives. . . . The liability is thus made to depend upon the character of the act in the performance of which the injury arises, without regard to the rank of the employé performing it. If it is one pertaining to the duty that the master owes to his servants, he is responsible to them for the manner of its performance. The converse of the proposition necessarily follows: If the act is one which pertains to the duty of an operative, the employé performing it is a mere servant; and the master, although liable to strangers, is not liable to a fellow servant for its improper performance." To the same effect are Lindall v. Woods, 41 Minn. 212, 4 L. R. A. 798; Davis v. Central Vermont R. Co. 55 Vt. 84; State v. Maister, 57 Md. 287; Indiana Car Co. v. Parker, 100 Ind. 191; Hussey v. Coger, 112 N. Y. 614, 3 L. R. A. 559; Copper v. Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. 108 Ind. 805, 1 West. Rep. 287; Yates v. McCullough Iron Co. 60 Md. 870; Baltimore Elevator Co. v. Neal, 65 Md. 488; McGovern v. Columbus Mfg. Co. 80 Ga. 227; Lewis v. Seifert, 116 Pa. 628, 9 Cent. Rep. 751; Olsen v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 38 Minn. 117; Anderson v. Winston, 81 Fed. Rep. 528; Webb v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 97 N. C. 887.

This list might be added to, but we are concerned, not so much about the number of cases to be cited in support of our views, as about the soundness of our position upon principle. We believe that the fellow-servant rule should hedge about all masters without discrimination: that its wise and just barrier against liability should not be broken down by a fiction; that those whose business, from its very nature, necessitates gradations of service should not be deprived of its protection on account of a distinction which in no manner affects the considerations which gave it birth, and have led to its almost universal adoption. We see nothing to justify the limitation doctrine, except the increased safety of employés in a dangerous business; and this applies, if at all, equally to cases where the two servants are of the same grade. But, so far from augmenting their safety, the liability of the master will have the contrary effect, if it produces any effect at all. That servant will grow more careless who, instead of being exclusively liable for his own negligence, finds that beyond him is another liability, so much more desirable to the injured servant that the careless servant is invariably lost sight of,—the liability of the corporation, against which the verdict is more easily secured, and, when obtained, is certain of payment.

We have assumed that our Statutes on this question (§ 8753, Comp. Laws) are only declaratory of the common law. But we do not decide whether they limit the liability of a master. They certainly impose upon him no greater responsibility than the common law, and, as the question of their restrictive force has not been discussed, we do not decide it. See Herbert v. Northern P. R. Co. 38 Dak. 38, on appeal, 116 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 755, and dissenting opinion.

We are clear that the trial court erred in refusing to charge the jury that the negligence of Withnell in failing to block the pile was the negligence of a fellow servant, and in instructing them that it was not; and for this error the judgment of the district court is reversed. There are other questions in the case, on which we refrain from expressing any opinion, as the evidence on a new trial may be materially different. This does not apply to the question of interest, and we therefore hold that the trial court erred in charging the jury to give the plaintiff interest on his recovery, without submitting it to their discretion. "In an action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, . . . interest may be given in the discretion of the jury." Comp. Laws, § 4578.

Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.

WILLS KYLE.

(.....Ala.....)

Running a freight train without a cow-catcher attached to the engine is negligence which will entitle an employé to recover for injuries occasioned by derailment of the train in running over a cow.

(January 23, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Birmingham City Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Hewitt, Walker & Porter, for appellant.

Messrs. E. T. Taliaferro and William Vaughan, for appellee:

It was the duty of the Company to employ the best machinery and appliances which are in use by well-regulated railroad companies, and to take the best precautions against danger, and its omission of this duty—the failure to have a cow-catcher on the engine—was negligence for which defendant is liable.

Memphis & O. R. Co. v. Lyon, 62 Ala. 71; Alabama & G. S. R. Co. v. Jones, 71 Ala. 487; Frankford & B. T. Co. v. Philadelphia & T. R. Co. 54 Pa. 345.

The jury having found necessarily that the injury came from the defects in the engine, and that the defective condition was imputable as negligence to defendant, the general charge should have been given for defendant.

Note to Bajus v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. 57 Am. Rep. 728.

Stone, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff appellee in this case was the servant (brakeman) in the employment of the appellant corporation. He was at his post of duty, and on one of the trains of the Railroad Company, when the train on which he was serving was derailed, and one of his legs was thereby so much injured and mangled as that he was forced to submit to amputation of the limb. The engine drawing the train—a freight train, with loaded cars—was without a pilot or cow-catcher, and the immediate cause of the derailment was that the train ran over a cow, and was thus thrown from the track. No other defect in the machinery, and none in the track, was shown. The contention of plaintiff was and is that the running of the train without a cow-catcher attached to the engine was negligence in the Railroad Company, which caused the injury, and entitles him to recover under the Statute. Code 1896, § 2590. So much of that Statute as pertains to this case reads as follows: "When a personal injury is received by a servant or employé in the service or business of the master or employer, the master or employer is liable to answer in damages, to such servant or employé, as if he were a stranger, and not engaged in such service or employment, in the cases following: (1) When the injury is caused by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery or plant connected with or used in the business of the master or employer. . . . But the master or employer is not liable, under this section, if the servant or employé knew of the defect or negligence causing the injury, and failed in a reasonable time to give information thereof to the master or employer, or to some person superior to himself, engaged in the service or employment of the master or employer, unless he was aware that the master or employer, or such superior, already knew of such defect or negligence; nor is the master or employer liable under subdivision 1, unless the defect therein mentioned arose from, or had not been discovered or remedied owing to, the negligence of the master or employer, or of some person in the service of the master or employer, and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery or plant were in proper condition."

It was testified on the trial that those in control of the train knew the engine was being run without a cow-catcher, and it would over-tax credulity to suppose that either the conductor or engineer operating the train was ignorant of that fact. It was shown that switch-engines, on all well-regulated railroads, are operated without pilots or cow-catchers, and satisfactory reasons are given why they are so run. The operations of switch-engines are confined to stock-yards, and to the switching area of the track. As a rule, they are much more easily brought under control of the engineer than road engines are: first, because they move at a much lower rate of speed; and, secondly, because they usually draw fewer and less-burdened cars, and hence their momentum is much more easily overcome. This, however, can furnish no excuse or palliation in this case. At the time the plaintiff was injured the engine was not engaged in switching, nor was it within the area allotted to such operations. It was drawing a freight train of loaded cars, and could not be easily or speedily brought to a stand-still. All the testimony agrees that the cow-catcher is useful in throwing obstructions from the track; that they are in general use alike on passenger and freight trains; and that, when used, derailments by obstructions on the track are less likely to occur. And there is no testimony that they are a new invention, or one the utility of which is in dispute or doubt in the minds of railroad men. It is common knowledge that they have long been in general, if not universal, use on railroads. The city court did not err in refusing to let the witness Elmore testify about another case. Nor was there error in refusing to give the general charge. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hall (Ala.) present term.

Affirmed.

(91 Cal. 192.)

1. The power of a court to restore to capacity, under Code Civ. Proc., § 1768, persons adjudged insane or incompetent, is applicable only to incompetent persons for whom guardians have been appointed under § 1764.
2. A person committed to an insane asylum is restored to his legal capacity to sue by his discharge from the asylum by the resident physician, in accordance with the Statutes (Pol. Code, § 2197; Act March 9, 1885; Deer. Pol. Code, p. 360).
3. The order of commitment of a person to an insane asylum is not conclusive evidence against him, in an action for the malicious prosecution of him as an insane person.
4. A rehearing will not be granted in order to consider points not made in the argument upon which the case was originally submitted.

Messrs. Gottschalk & Luckel for respondent Wernick.

Vanelle, C., filed the following opinion:

The purpose of this action is to recover from the defendants damages for a malicious prosecution of the plaintiff as an insane person, and causing him to be unlawfully arrested and committed to the insane asylum at Stockton. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained by the court. The plaintiff declined to amend his complaint, and final judgment was thereupon rendered against him, dismissing his complaint, and for costs, from which he appeals on the judgment roll. The grounds of demurrer are that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and "that it appears upon the face of the complaint that the plaintiff has not the legal capacity to sue herein." The substance of those parts of the complaint relevant to these grounds of demurrer is as follows: That on January 28, 1889, the defendants willfully, maliciously, unlawfully and without probable cause, "caused and procured the plaintiff to be arrested and committed to the state insane asylum at Stockton, State of California, on the charge of insanity; that under and by virtue of said commitment plaintiff was unlawfully and against his will detained and imprisoned in said state insane asylum, at Stockton, on said charge of insanity, for and during the period from said 28th day of January, 1889, up to and including the 20th day of February, 1889, whereupon said plaintiff was then and there given leave of absence, and afterwards, to wit, April 18, 1889, was discharged; that plaintiff was not on said 28th of January, 1889, or ever at any other time, before or since said day, dangerously insane, or insane at all, nor was he at any of said times so far disordered in his mind as to injure health, person or property, all of which was known by said defendants before and at the time of said arrest and commitment."

The learned counsel for respondents contend that the demurrer was properly sustained, on the ground that the plaintiff had not legal capacity to sue, for the reasons: (1) that it appears on the face of the complaint that the plaintiff had been adjudged to be insane on January 28, 1889, by the judge of a court of record, pursuant to section 2317 of the Political

Code, relating to commitments to the state insane asylums; and (2) that such adjudication is conclusive upon the plaintiff, not only that he was insane at the time he was so adjudged, but that he continued to be insane at the time this action was commenced, unless before that time he had been found to be of sound mind, and capable of taking care of himself and property, as authorized by section 1766 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is true that where guardians have been appointed for persons who, by reason of their insanity, imbecility or habitual drunkenness, are mentally incompetent to manage their property, under statutes in other States similar to article 2, title 11, pt. 8, of our Code of Civil Procedure (§§ 1763-1766), it has been held that an adjudication of such incompetency is conclusive against all persons dealing with the ward until he is restored to capacity to manage his own affairs, by an order of a court similar to that authorized by section 1766 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The cases of Wadsworth v. Sharpsteen, 8 N. Y. 388, and Imhoff v. Witmer, 81 Pa. 243, are fair samples of the strongest cases to this effect. In the latter case the court said: "The object of the Statute was protection and guardianship over persons and estates of parties wanting capacity to take proper care of either, and to preserve the property of such from being squandered or improvidently used to their own injury and that of their families, if they have any. It is not necessary to adduce reasons to prove the self-evident proposition that, to admit the capacity of control to exist in the lunatic or habitual drunkard over his estate, after inquisition settling his condition in this respect, or submit it to be controverted by evidence of lucid intervals or sobriety at the moment of contracting, would leave the estates of these unfortunate classes about as much exposed as before proceedings had in regard to them. The inquisition and decree, standing of record, was intended for notice to all the world of the incapacity of the particular party to contract. It is the judgment of the law to this effect, and, as a consequence, his acts in regard to his property are absolutely void while the condition exists."

In the case cited from 8 N. Y. the court said: "The right of the committee to the custody and control of the property is not superseded during the drunkard's sober intervals, and therefore, during such intervals, the drunkard has no more authority to deal with, or dispose of, the property, than while he is in a state of intoxication. If it were otherwise, the proceedings would furnish a very ineffectual security against waste and improvidence. Every transaction would be open to litigation upon the question whether it took place while the drunkard was in a state of sobriety or intoxication, and the committee could not execute his trust with safety to himself, or benefit to the drunkard or his family."

These quotations are made merely to show that the reasons assigned in those cases for holding an adjudication of incompetency conclusive until set aside cannot be applied to the order of a judge in this State committing a person to the state insane asylum, under the provisions of the Political Code, although they may be applicable to adjudications of our courts in proceedings had under section 1766 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But, whether the reasons assigned in those cases are to be considered sufficient for holding an adjudication of incompetency, under section 1766 of the Code of Civil Procedure, conclusive against the person adjudged incompetent until set aside, as therein provided, need not be decided in this case, since it seems clear that the proceeding against insane and other mentally incompetent persons, authorized by the Code of Civil Procedure, is entirely distinct from the proceedings authorized by the Political Code for the commitment of insane persons to the state insane asylum. The provision in section 1766 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizing the court to restore the person adjudged insane or incompetent to capacity is only applicable to persons adjudged insane or incompetent, and for whom guardians have been appointed under section 1764 of the same Code. The application of it to persons committed to the asylums would be utterly inconsistent with the government of those institutions according to the requirements and regulations of the Political Code. After a person has been committed to either of the insane asylums on a charge of insanity, and received into the asylum, no court in this State is authorized to discharge him therefrom, or to restore him to the capacity of a sane person, under any circumstances, except upon writ of habeas corpus. The power to discharge him otherwise than upon habeas corpus is vested exclusively in the officers of the asylum. Section 2197 of the Political Code provides: "Insane persons received in the asylums must, upon recovery, be discharged therefrom." This implies the power to determine whether or not the patient has recovered. By an Act of March 9, 1885, the resident physician is authorized, and it is made his duty, to discharge persons who have been improperly committed. Deer. Pol. Code, p. 850. By another Act of March 9, 1885 (Deer. Pol. Code, p. 842), it is provided that the kindred or friends of an inmate of the asylum may apply to the judge who committed him for an order to be directed to the trustees of the asylum for his removal to their custody, and, upon their proving that they are capable and suited to take care of him, and to give protection against his insane acts, the judge may issue the order. But the Act further provides that "the trustees shall reject all other orders or applications for the release or removal of any insane person, except the order of a court or judge on proceedings in habeas corpus." See also a like provision in section 19 of "An Act to Provide for the Future Management of the Napa State Asylum," approved March 6, 1876 (Stat. 1875-76, p. 133).

It would seem, therefore, not only that the power to discharge an inmate of the asylum is vested solely in the officers of the asylum, but that such power is to be exercised upon one of two grounds only: (1) that the insane inmate has recovered; and (2) that he had been improperly committed. I think the effect of a discharge on either ground, if no guardian had been appointed under the Act of March 9, 1885 (Deer. Pol. Code, p. 842), would be to restore the person discharged to legal capacity to sue. A discharge on the first ground is an adjudication, by competent authority, that the person had recovered from insanity; and a discharge on the second ground, by like authority, overrules or nullifies the order of commitment, and leaves the person committed in the same status, as to capacity to sue, that he was in before he was committed. Civil Code, § 40. Besides, I think the order of commitment is not conclusive evidence against the plaintiff in this action of his insanity at any time, or of probable cause for the prosecution of which he complains; for, if it is so, it is difficult to conceive how he is to prove a cause of action which depends upon the truth of his averments that he was not insane to the degree required by section 2317 of the Political Code, or at all, at the time the order was made, and that the prosecution was without probable cause. If he is estopped, by the order of commitment, from proving these averments, it would seem to follow that no action for a malicious prosecution on a charge of insanity, resulting in an order of commitment, can be maintained; yet the authorities sanction such actions. Cooley, Torts, § 176 et seq.

That the order of commitment would not thus estop or conclude the plaintiff in a proceeding by writ of habeas corpus is obvious, and we have seen that it is not final, or conclusive as to the resident physician of the asylum, whose duty it is to disregard it, if, in his opinion, it was not properly made. Indeed, the final determination, as to whether the person committed is insane or not, is to be made and announced by the resident physician of the asylum. The proceeding before the judge is only preliminary, and is analogous to the preliminary examination of a criminal charge by a magistrate. As the only ground of demurrer argued here is that the plaintiff has not the legal capacity to sue, and no particular in which the complaint fails to state a cause of action has been suggested by counsel, or discovered, I think the judgment should be reversed, and the court below directed to overrule the demurrer.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the court below directed to overrule the demurrer.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed and on January 17, 1891, the following opinion was handed down in response thereto:

Per Curiam:

In submitting this case for decision, respondents argued but a single point raised by their demurrer to the appellant's complaint. We considered that objection, and decided it correctly. In their petition for a rehearing, other objections to the complaint are called to our attention; but we have decided—and with manifest propriety—that we will not grant a rehearing in order to consider points not made in the argument upon which the case was originally submitted. A respondent whose demurrer has been sustained by the superior court ought to fairly present in this court every objection upon which he relies. We cannot be expected to scrutinize the record for the purpose of discovering points which counsel have not taken the trouble to specify.

Rehearing denied.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

NATIONAL PROGRESS BUNCHING MACHINE CO.

v.

JOHN R. WILLIAMS CO.

(44 Fed. Rep. 190.)

1. A combination to be patentable must not only be new, but it must produce a new result, or an old result in a better way.
2. A new result produced by a combination of old elements must be due to their co-operative action; they must so act that each qualifies every other. If they act independently, or if one acts independently of the others, it is an aggregation and not a patentable combination.
3. A patent for a cigar bunching machine which consists of a combination of old elements, one of which is a "bunch receiver" or receptacle which performs no function except to hold the bunch after it is finished instead of letting it fall to the floor or into a box, or into the hand of the operator, is invalid because there is only an aggregation of the parts and not a combination, the function of the other parts being entirely independent of the bunch receiver.
4. An unusually specific description of the parts in a claim for a combination of elements, all of which are old, where the patent is only for an improvement upon prior machines, cannot be broadened by construction so as to cover the use of a combination which leaves out some of the elements described.

(December 8, 1890.)

NOTE.—Patent for combinations.

A patent for a combination, where the inventor is not a pioneer in the art, must be strictly construed. Lapham Dodge Co. v. Severin, 40 Fed. Rep. 762, citing Union Water-Meter Co. v. Desper, 101 U. S. 237, 25 L. ed. 1026; Goodyear Dental V. Co. v. Davis, 102 U. S. 227, 26 L. ed. 150.

A patent which is for improvements merely in a combination must receive a narrow construction, and be limited to the form of combination therein described. Eagle Mfg. Co. v. Miller, 41 Fed. Rep. 351.

In a suit on a patent, a claim must be limited, where it is a combination of parts, to a combination of all the elements included in the claim as necessarily constituting that combination. Phoenix Caster Co. v. Spiegel, 123 U. S. 320, 33 L. ed. 623; Rosmer v. Peddie, 123 U. S. 315, 33 L. ed. 623, citing Leggett v. Avery, 101 U. S. 256, 25 L. ed. 866; Goodyear Dental V. Co. v. Davis, supra; Fay v. Cordesman, 109 U. S. 408, 27 L. ed. 979; Mahn v. Harwood, 112 U. S. 354, 359, 28 L. ed. 655, 667; Union Metallic Cartridge Co. v. United States C. Co. 112 U. S. 624, 28 L. ed. 822; Sargent v. Hall Safe & Lock Co. 114 U. S. 63, 29 L. ed. 67; Shepard v. Carrigan, 116 U. S. 593, 29 L. ed. 722; White v. Dunbar, 119 U. S. 47, 30 L. ed. 308; Sutter v. Robinson, 119 U. S. 590, 30 L. ed. 422; Bragg v. Fitch, 121 U. S. 473, 30 L. ed. 1008; Snow v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 121 U. S. 517, 30 L. ed. 1004; Crawford v. Heysinger, 123 U. S. 559, 31 L. ed. 299.

It cannot be permitted to read into it any delicate adjusting apparatus not originally included in the claim. Howe Mach. Co. v. National Needle Co. 124 U. S. 583, 31 L. ed. 933.

A party who uses a patented combination cannot escape the consequences of infringement by showing that he uses something in addition to the combination. Williams v. Barnard, 41 Fed. Rep. 353.

In construing patents the doctrine of mechanical equivalents is applicable to claims for combina-

BILL in equity to restrain the alleged infringement of letters-patent No. 381,678, granted December 1, 1885, to Nicholas H. Borgfeldt and Adolph C. Schutz for an improved cigar-bunching machine. Dismissed.

The machine is designed to produce automatically the inner part or bunch of a cigar.

This controversy relates to the following claim of the patent:

(9). In a bunch-machine, the combination of the cylinder B, having notched disk D, and chute C, with the reciprocating hopper I, reciprocating plunger L, apron M, sliding frame N, having roller v, and a bunch receiver R, substantially as specified.

The further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Briesen & Knauth, for complainant:

The ninth claim of complainant's patent covers a patentable combination.

Sugar Apparatus Mfg. Co. v. Yaryan Mfg. Co. 43 Fed. Rep. 140; Holmes Burglar Alarm Teleg. Co. v. Domestic Teleg. & Teleg. Co. 43 Fed. Rep. 220.

The complainants cannot be regarded as claiming a new combination of new elements, but they seek to hold by their patent a new combination of old elements, for the purpose of producing a new result. Such a combination is favorably receivable; and the complainant is entitled to invoke in its behalf the doctrine of equivalents. Anyone will not be at liberty, because these elements are old, to substitute for one well-known and old element tions of old elements and improvements on primary inventions, as well as to claims for primary inventions themselves. Tatum v. Gregory, 41 Fed. Rep. 142, citing Gould v. Rees, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 192, 21 L. ed. 40; Seymour v. Osborne, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 555, 20 L. ed. 42; Gill v. Wells, 89 U. S. 23 Wall. 23, 22 L. ed. 711.

The mere combination of an oval roll of toilet paper with a toilet-paper fixture, both of which are old, is not patentable where no new mode of operation results. Morgan Envelope Co. v. Albany Perforated W. P. Co. 40 Fed. Rep. 577.

A patent for a combination cannot be defeated by proof of the prior use of one part of the combination in one mechanism, and another part in another. Consolidated R. M. Co. v. Coombs, 39 Fed. Rep. 25; Bates v. Coe, 98 U. S. 48, 25 L. ed. 74; Parks v. Booth, 102 U. S. 104, 26 L. ed. 57.

If it be a claim to a combination, and be restricted to specified elements, all must be regarded as material, leaving open only the question whether an omitted part is supplied by an equivalent device or instrumentality. Fay v. Cordesman, 109 U. S. 408, 27 L. ed. 979; Union Water-Meter Co. v. Desper, 101 U. S. 322, 25 L. ed. 1024; Gage v. Herring, 107 U. S. 640, 27 L. ed. 602.

A substitution for one element, in a combination, of something having a different or additional function, amounts to the same thing as adding to the combination a new and distinct instrument, and may make the improvement patentable. Holmes Burglar Alarm Teleg. Co. v. Domestic Teleg. & Teleg. Co. 43 Fed. Rep. 220, distinguishing Wooster v. Blake, 8 Fed. Rep. 428; Dudgeon v. Watson, 29 Fed. Rep. 248; Assmus v. Alden, 27 Fed. Rep. 684. See Johnson v. Brooklyn & C. R. Co. 2 L. R. A. 439, 37 Fed. Rep. 147; Underwood v. Gerber 2 L. R. A. 357, 37 Fed. Rep. 793.

some other well-known old element having the same function. The substitution, in lieu of the specific measuring device of the patent, of some other equally old and well-known measuring device, will not avoid the charge of infringement.

Morley Sewing Mach. Co. v. Lancaster, 139 U. S. 263, 32 L. ed. 715; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. National Car Brakes Shoe Co. 110 U. S. 229, 28 L. ed. 129.

Mr. Charles C. Gill, for defendant:

The terms of the claim are clear and definite. The claim of the patent is confined to the mechanism therein specifically referred to.

2 Pat. Off. Gaz. p. 197; Seymour v. Osborne, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 548, 20 L. ed. 39; Corn-planter Patent Case, 90 U. S. 28 Wall. 218, 23 L. ed. 168.

Attempts at overreaching and unlawful expansion of claims have never been countenanced.

Celluloid Mfg. Co. v. Cellonite Mfg. Co. 42 Fed. Rep. 900; Goodyear Dental V. Co. v. Davis, 102 U. S. 222, 26 L. ed. 149; White v. Dunbar, 119 U. S. 52, 30 L. ed. 805; Keystone Bridge Co. v. Phoenix Iron Co. 95 U. S. 274, 24 L. ed. 844.

The defendant having patents for the machine alleged to infringe, prima facie its title is as good as that of the complainant.

Where the question of infringement is in doubt, the fact that the defendant is acting under authority of a patent is sufficient to resolve the doubt against the complainant.

Corning v. Burden, 56 U. S. 15 How. 253, 14 L. ed. 688; Trader v. Messmore, 1 Bann. & Ard. 639, 7 Pat. Off. Gaz. 386.

The burden of proving the infringement is on the complainant.

Puller v. Yentzer, 94 U. S. 288, 24 L. ed. 108. See Rogers v. Beecher, 8 Fed. Rep. 639.

If the ingredient substituted by the defendant for the one left out in the defendant's machine was a newly discovered one, or even an old one performing some new function, and was not known at the date of plaintiff's patent as a proper substitute for the ingredient left out, the charge of infringement cannot be maintained.

Gill v. Wells, 9 Brodix, 589; Rowell v. Lindsay, 113 U. S. 97, 28 L. ed. 906; Gould v. Rees, 83 U. S. 15 Wall. 194, 21 L. ed. 41.

The application of the old feeding and measuring devices, the chute, the funnel and the presser to an old rolling table did not involve invention; and certainly by reason of such application the complainant cannot prevent others from making use of the same old instrumentalities in any way an intelligent mechanic may see fit to arrange them.

dency of modern decisions is more than ever toward a strict construction of claims and a finding of non-infringement in doubtful cases.

Snow v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 121 U. S. 617, 30 L. ed. 1004; Newton v. Furst & Bradley Mfg. Co. 119 U. S. 373, 30 L. ed. 443; California A. Stone Paving Co. v. Scholicks, 119 U. S. 401, 30 L. ed. 471; Hartshorn v. Saginaw Barrel Co. 119 U. S. 664, 30 L. ed. 539; Grier v. Willt, 120 U. S. 412, 30 L. ed. 712; Crescent Brewing Co. v. Gottfried, 128 U. S. 153, 33 L. ed. 391; McCormick v. Graham, 139 U. S. 1, 33 L. ed. 598; Sargent v. Burgess, 129 U. S. 19, 33 L. ed. 604; Peters v. Active Mfg. Co. 129 U. S. 580, 32 L. ed. 788; Union Water-Meter Co. v. Deeper, 101 U. S. 332, 25 L. ed. 1024.

The differences between the complainant's machine and the defendant's machine are substantial and material, and amply sufficient to warrant a finding of non-infringement.

Blake v. San Francisco, 118 U. S. 679, 28 L. ed. 1070; Fay v. Cordeman, 109 U. S. 408, 27 L. ed. 979.

The complainant is forced to contend that the claim is broad and comprehensive, otherwise the prosecution could not have even the shadow of foundation. When given a liberal interpretation, however, the claim falls within the rule announced in Pickering v. McCollough, 104 U. S. 310, 26 L. ed. 749, and is invalid.

Coze, J., delivered the following opinion: The machine covered by the ninth claim of the patent is designed to make a cigar bunch—which is all of a cigar minus the outer wrapper—from scrap-tobacco. The tobacco is placed in a large receptacle or cylinder which throws out accurately measured quantities, through a chute, into a vertically movable funnel, each does being sufficient for one bunch. The funnel is provided with a plunger which descends upon the tobacco and compacts it into a form approximating a cigar. It is then delivered upon an apron on which a leaf of tobacco, called a "binder," has been placed and is rolled, by means of a traveling roller, into a completed bunch. This bunch is deposited in a clamp, or receiver, where it is held intact until removed by hand. The claim covers a bunch machine having the following features: first, the cylinder B, having notched disk D and chute C; second, the reciprocating hopper I; third, the reciprocating plunger L; fourth, the apron M; fifth, the sliding frame N, having roller v; sixth, the bunch receiver R. Experts and counsel agree that these elements, considered separately, were old and well known. The complainant has vied with the defendant in demonstrating that each was "thoroughly old" long prior to the date of the patent. The complainant's brief states the proposition as follows: "Now, therefore, it is clear from the foregoing that the complainant cannot be regarded as claiming a new combination of new elements, but that it seeks to hold by its patent a new combination of old elements—old, well-known elements—for the purpose of producing a new result."

Not only was each element old, but sometimes two and sometimes three had been united to do similar work to that of the complainant's machine. Machines for making cigars were known over forty years ago, and since then there has been a steady evolution in the art. Previous to the patent, machines were in use which discharged the tobacco in accurate doses, compacted it by pressure into the shape of a cigar and rolled the binder and filler into the finished bunch. The machines in controversy show the progress which time would naturally develop in a busy and lucrative industry.

But two defenses will be examined: first, Does the claim cover a combination or an aggregation?—and, second, Does the defendant infringe?

In order to be patentable a combination must not only be new but it must produce a new result, or an old result in a better way. If the combination be old and the result new, or if the result be unchanged and the combination new, in either case there is no patentable novelty. In a combination of old elements all the parts must so act that each qualifies every other. If they act independently, or if one acts independently of the others, it is an aggregation. It is not enough that these independent parts are conveniently associated in one machine, if each performs the same function it did before they were united. They must be so connected that the new result is due to their co-operative action. Thatcher Heating Co. v. Burris, 121 U. S. 266, 30 L. ed. 942; Pickering v. McCullough, 104 U. S. 810, 26 L. ed. 749; Packing Company Cases, 105 U. S. 566, 26 L. ed. 1172; Hasles v. Van Wormer, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 858, 22 L. ed. 241; Bussell Trimmer Co. v. Stevens, 187 U. S. 423, 34 L. ed. 719, 53 Pat. Off. Gaz. 2044; Stephenson v. Brooklyn C. T. R. Co. 114 U. S. 149, 39 L. ed. 58; Becher Mfg. Co. v. Atwater Mfg. Co. 114 U. S. 523, 29 L. ed. 232; Laundry Machinery Co. v. Bunnell, 27 Fed. Rep. 810; Merwin, Patentability, 401.

The ninth claim must be considered as covering, irrespective of connecting mechanism, the combination of elements therein enumerated, and tested by the foregoing rules, it is somewhat difficult to perceive what new result is produced by their united action. That the machine is better than any which preceded it is sufficiently established; but it is argued by the defendant that, although a number of old devices and instrumentalities are placed in convenient juxtaposition, each acts just as it did before. The cylinder will, it is said, discharge the dose in the old way irrespective of the fact that the hopper and plunger are under the chute. The hopper and plunger will compact the tobacco in the similitude of a cigar whether the tobacco is dropped from the chute or is placed in the hopper by hand. The roller will roll and the receiver will hold the bunch in the same manner separately as in their present position. And yet it is thought that the claim might be sustained for a combination were it not for the introduction of the last element—the bunch receiver. The result to be accomplished is the finished bunch. This object is attained by the successive action of the cylinder, the hopper and plunger and the rolling apparatus. It is true that if one of these were removed the others would act, but the bunch would not be made in a manner so convenient and advantageous. For these elements a combination claim might be sustained within the doctrine of the following authorities: Furbush 12 L. R. A.

v. Cook, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 668; Haffman v. Young, 2 Fed. Rep. 74; Birdsall v. McDonald, 1 Bann. & Ard. 165.

But the introduction of the bunch receiver renders the application of these cases to the claim in question, at least, exceedingly doubtful. What reciprocity can there be between the clamp at the end of the rolling table and the cylinder at the top of the machine? In what way does the cylinder act upon the clamp or the clamp upon the cylinder? Remove either and the other would perform its function unimpaired. The clamp is simply a convenient device for holding the completed bunch. Its very name, "bunch-receiver," would seem to preclude its being a part of the combination. A combination produces something which, when finished, is placed in a receptacle. The receptacle adds nothing to the manufactured thing—it simply holds it. To use the language of the complainant's expert: "Such bunch-receiver is entirely independent and outside of the rolling apron." All action of the other parts of the machine ceases before the clamp begins to perform its office. The bunch (the result) is finished, and rather than have it fall to the floor, or into a box, or into the hand of the operator, the patentees thought it convenient to provide, what complainant's counsel aptly terms, "a mechanical hand" to receive it. This hand has no more to do with the operation of the cylinder, the reciprocating plunger, or the roller, than would a hand of flesh and blood, if placed at the end of the table to catch the bunch. Test it by carrying the operation a step or two further. It is said that the cigar is taken from the clamp by the operator, who places it in a cigar mold and applies the final external wrapper. Assume that the mold is located directly under the clamp, with proper machinery arranged to deposit the bunch in the mold and to convey it to an automatic wrapper-applying device, and again to a cigar box, where it is packed and prepared for the market. Can it be that these structures—the mold, the wrapper-applying machine and the box—could be added to the elements of the claim and included in a valid combination? And yet these also are the progressive but independent steps in accomplishing the desired result—a cigar ready for the smoker. There is no more combination between the cylinder which acts at the beginning of the bunch-making operation and the receptacle for holding the bunch at the end, than there is between a canal-boat which receives the grain from the elevator chute, and the bin from which the grain is taken; no more than there is between the knife of the guillotine, and the basket which catches the head of the victim. In a recent case the supreme court decided that where the mechanical operation and effect of the patented devices are the same, whether one of the elements of the claim is present or absent, there can be no patentable combination between those devices and that element. It is a mere aggregation. Fond du Lac v. May, 127 U. S. 395, 34 L. ed. 714, 53 Pat. Off. Gaz. 1884.

But irrespective of these views, it is thought that there is no infringement. It will be observed that the claim is more than ordinarily specific. Every element is designated by a letter restricting it to the mechanism shown in the description and drawings. The complainant contends that the claim may be construed substantially as follows: In a bunch machine, the combination of a measuring and dose-distributing device, having a chute or outlet, with a dose-receiving, shaping and compacting device, a bunch-rolling and binder-applying device and a bunch-receiver or clamp, substantially as specified.

It is not necessary to consider what might have been the result had such a claim been allowed. It is enough that there is no such claim in the patent and none that can be so broadened by construction. Even if the state of the art permitted it, and it does not, the use of language unusually concise and technical makes the parts, thus referred to, essential features of the claim, and precludes a loose construction. The courts are not to consider what the patentees might have patented, but what they did patent. Here they have accepted a claim limited to the mechanism shown in the description and drawings. The court cannot now construct for them a different claim. Keystone Bridge Co. v. Phoenix Iron Co. 95 U. S. 274, 24 L. ed. 844; Snow v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 121 U. S. 20 How. 402, 15 L. ed. 980; Norton v. Haight, 22 Fed. Rep. 787.

The case of Morley Sewing Mach. Co. v. Lancaster, 129 U. S. 263, 32 L. ed. 715, relied on by the complainant, is not in point, as appears from the following quotation from the opinion: "Morley, having been the first person who succeeded in producing an automatic machine for sewing buttons of the kind in question upon fabrics, is entitled to a liberal construction of the claims of his patent. He was not a mere improver upon a prior machine which was capable of accomplishing the same general result; in that case his claims would properly receive a narrower interpretation."

Morley was a pioneer, he claimed his invention broadly and the court said he was right. These patentees are not pioneers. They are improvers upon prior machines. They have claimed the features of their machine narrowly, and the court is of the opinion that they were right in so doing. Adopting these well-known rules of construction it is clear that the defendant does not infringe.

The proposition that the defendant's machine contains the six enumerated features of the claim cannot be maintained. The complainant's theory seems to be that the succinct language of the specification may be ignored, and that the defendant's machine contains the "essential elements" of the claim, if construed as above. In other words, if the claim is for a combination containing four main sub-elements operating substantially like the apparatus described, the defendant infringes. Perhaps this is so, but, as before stated, the patent does not contain such a claim. The defendant does not use a cylinder or a notched disk, and there are essential points of difference in the defendant's compacting and rolling apparatus. The same rules of interpretation must apply to all parts of the claim. It will not do to place a broad construction upon one part and a narrow construction upon another part. If any measuring and distributing device may be substituted for "the cylinder B, having notched disk D, and chute C," it would seem to be equally clear that any compacting device may be substituted for "the reciprocating hopper I, and reciprocating plunger L," and so on. In view of the prior art and the explicit language of the claim it is thought that such a loose interpretation is not permissible, and that the court would not be justified in omitting features expressly designated as essential to the combination. But if the claim were so construed it would then be broad enough to include some of the prior Williams structures, and so would be anticipated.

It follows that the bill must be dismissed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

George E. BULLARD et al., Trustees under the Will of Mary D. Whitney, Deceased, TOWN OF SHIRLEY et al.

(.....Mass.....)

1. The legal incapacity of a town to support a clergyman entirely defeats a bequest to it, made "strictly on this condition," that it shall support him.
  2. Legal incapacity of a legatee to perform a condition on which the gift is made will prevent it from taking effect, although the time for performance was subsequent thereto.
  3. A gift over is not affected by the rule against perpetuities where the primary gift falls at once and as matter of law on the face of the will.

(May 19, 1891.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County (Holmes, J.) for the opinion of the full court of a bill filed by the trustees under the will of Mary D. Whitney, deceased, for instructions as to the proper construction of the second clause of such will.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

For a prior construction of the same clause of the will now in controversy, see Bullard v. Chandler, 5 L. R. A. 104, 149 Mass. 540.

Mr. H. E. Ware for plaintiffs.

Mr. Warren H. Atwood, for the Town of Shirley, respondent:

The purpose and objects of the gift come within the Statute of 48 Eliz., chap. 4, and also within the definitions of a public charity, in Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen, 539, 556, and in Saltonstall v. Sanders, 11 Allen, 446, 456.

Bullard v. Chandler, 5 L. R. A. 104, 149 Mass. 540; Going v. Emery, 16 Pick. 107; Earle v. Wood, 8 Cush. 430, 445; Fairbanks v. Lomson, 99 Mass. 583; Dexter v. Gardner, 7 Allen, 243; Old South Soc. v. Crocker, 119 Mass. 1; North Adams Soc. v. Fitch, 8 Gray, 421; Sohier v. St. Paul's Church, 12 Met. 250; Bartlett v. Nye, 4 Met. 378, 380; Atty-Gen. v. Trinity Church, 9 Allen, 423, 439; Drury v. Natick, 10 Allen, 169; Schouler, Petitioner, 134 Mass. 426; Winslow v. Cummings, 8 Cush. 358; Brown v. Kasey, 2 Cush. 243; Shrewsbury v. Hornby, 5 Hare, 406; Atty-Gen. v. Gladstone, 13 Sim. 7; Powerscourt v. Powerscourt, 1 Moll. 616; Thorner v. Wilson, 8 Drew. 245, 4 Drew. 350; Lloyd v. Spillet, 3 P. Wms. 844; Atty-Gen. v. Cock, 2 Ves. Sr. 278; Mills v. Farmer, 1 Meriv. 55; Buck, Parishes, 162.

The "condition" annexed to the gift to the Town of Shirley is illegal, and the Town cannot comply with it.

Mass. Const. Amend. art. 11; Pub. Stat. chap. 27, §§ 9, 10; chap. 88, § 19; Minot v. West Roadbury, 113 Mass. 1; Hood v. Lynn, 1 Allen, 108, 105; Parsons v. Goshen, 11 Pick. 396; Stetson v. Kempton, 18 Mass. 272.

It is a condition subsequent.

Pinlay v. King, 28 U. S. 8 Pet. 346, 7 L. ed. 701; Lindsey v. Lindsey, 45 Ind. 553, 563.

If performance of a condition subsequent is impossible, because contrary to law or public policy, such condition is void, and the estate to which it is annexed is absolute, notwithstanding the intention or express direction of the testator that, upon breach of condition, it shall revert to his heirs.

The Town of Shirley is capable of taking and holding the fund as trustee, and of administering the trust.

See Webb v. Neal, 5 Allen, 575; Worcester v. Eaton, 18 Mass. 371, 378; Com. v. Wilder, 127 Mass. 1, 4; White v. South Parish in Braintree, 13 Met. 506, 513; *Drury v. Towns may take and hold gifts for religious purposes.

Com. v. Wilder, supra.

When there is a gift to charity, coupled with an illegal, or merely burdensome, condition or direction, the charity will be supported and the condition will fail.

The attempted limitation over to the heirs-at-law is void, because it is to take effect upon the breach of an illegal and void condition; also, because it is a conditional limitation which is to take effect, if at all, by way of an executory devise or bequest, and upon an event which may not happen within the time allowed by the rule against perpetuities.

Brattle Square Church v. Grant, supra; Odell v. Odell, 10 Allen, 1, 7; Wells v. Heath, 10 Gray, 17.

Mr. S. K. Hamilton, for the First Congregational Society in Shirley, respondent:

The Town of Shirley is not capable of taking said gift and administering the trust because it is a gift to a charity which is not within the scope of the duties of a town, and is not even germane to the purposes for which such corporations exist.

Elliott*, 8 Rawle, 170; Philadelphia v. Girard, 45 Pa. 1; Philadelphia v. Fox, 64 Pa. 169.

In case of a gift to a charity, if the trustee named is incapable of taking it, the court will appoint a suitable trustee in his place.

Minot v. Baker, 6 New Eng. Rep. 688, 147 Mass. 348; Bliss v. American Bible Soc. 2 Allen, 384; Winslow v. Cummings, 8 Cush. 358; McCartee v. Orphan Asylum Soc. 9 Cow. 484; North Adams Soc. v. Fitch, 8 Gray, 421.

The principal intention of the testatrix will be carried out if possible, even if subordinate intentions and directions must be disregarded.

Sanderson v. White, 18 Pick. 328; Thellusson v. Woodford, 4 Ves. Jr. 320.

The law favors gifts to public charities. In case of a gift to a charity coupled with an illegal or merely burdensome condition, the condition will be held void and the charity will be supported.

Weeks v. Hobson, 6 L. R. A. 147, 150 Mass. 377; Nourse v. Merriam, 8 Cush. 11, 20, 31; Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen, 589.

The court is bound to carry the will into effect, if it can see a general intention to give to charity, "consistent with the rules of law, even if the particular mode or manner pointed out by the testator is illegal" or impracticable.

Jackson v. Phillips, supra; Bartlett v. Nye, 4 Met. 378; Sanderson v. White and Thellusson v. Woodford, supra.

In a gift to a public charity, the charity is deemed to be of the substance of the gift, and the mode in which it is to take effect is subordinate thereto.

Minot v. Baker, Winslow v. Cummings and Bliss v. American Bible Soc. supra.

Public charities will be administered ex parte if the exact directions of the testator cannot be followed.

Jackson v. Phillips, supra. See also Mogridge v. Thackwell, 7 Ves. Jr. 35; Mills v. Farmer, 1 Meriv. 55, 94, 96, 99, 100; Atty-Gen. v. Gladstone, 13 Sim. 7; Atty-Gen. v. Guise, 2 Vern. 286; Atty-Gen. v. Whitechurch, 3 Ves. Jr. 141, 145; Bartlett v. King, 12 Mass. 537, 543; Bur-

The fund will go to the residuary legatees, because there is no failure of the objects of the charity, and therefore no resulting trust, and because such a disposition would be contrary to the expressed intention of the testatrix.

Brattle Square Church v. Grant, 8 Gray, 142; Thayer v. Wellington, 9 Allen, 283.

If a corporation or person, having the ability and suitable in other respects, offers to assume and comply with the condition of the gift and to accept and execute the trust in the place of the Town of Shirley, it is consistent with the intention of the testatrix, and within the powers and practice of this court, to frame a scheme whereby said offer may be accepted, and said funds may be applied to the charity named.

Bliss v. American Bible Soc. supra; American Academy v. Harvard College, 13 Gray, 582; Winslow v. Cummings, supra.

Messrs. J. Willard, G. P. Sanger and G. L. Clarke, for the heirs-at-law, respondents:

The cy-près doctrine cannot be applied, either to enable the Town to use the income for any other purpose than the support of a Unitarian clergyman, or to change the conditional or limited gift particularly described by the testatrix into a general gift to promote Unitarian preaching in the Town of Shirley, and thus enable the parish to take.

Where the special object of charity fails, the doctrine of cy-près does not apply.

It is a common thing to offer to give a certain sum to a particular charity in case other persons of financial responsibility will promise to give a larger sum, which is held not to bind unless such promise is exactly complied with.

See Bates College v. Bates, 185 Mass. 487.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill for instructions, brought by the trustees under the will of Mary D. Whitney, touching the disposition of the fund given by the second clause of the will. That clause is as follows: "Secondly, I give and bequeath to my friend, Rev'd Seth Chandler, of Shirley, the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000), which after his death shall revert to the Town aforementioned strictly on this condition, namely: that said Town shall support, fairly and permanently, a Unitarian clergyman; in which case all interest accruing on above sum shall be used to aid in payment of his salary, failing which it shall revert to my heirs-at-law."

Seth Chandler died after the testatrix. It is admitted by all parties that the Town cannot lawfully support the clergyman as required, and the question is whether the gift fails on that account.

We are of opinion that support by the Town, and not merely in the Town, is of the essence of the condition. The words require it. They are explicit "that said Town shall support." Any latitude of interpretation based on conjectures as to what the testatrix would have done had she known of the difficulty raised by her language is excluded by the introductory and governing phrase "strictly on this condition." We must take her condition strictly as she wrote it, and taking it so it cannot be performed. Again we are of opinion that, although the act of supporting a minister need not begin until after the receipt of the legacy, a capacity to do the act is a condition attached to the gift itself. The case is not like one where it is attempted to impose an illegal restriction on the use of the thing granted. Here, that which by our construction is contemplated by the testatrix as the consideration and inducement of her gift fails altogether. It is true that the testatrix may be assumed to have acted from religious or charitable motives; but she says very plainly that the motive is not sufficient unless the terms of her bargain are complied with. The question is one of construction, not of technical rules. We cannot doubt that what she required from the Town went to the root of her gift. See Achorley v. Vernon, Willes, 153.

In Parker v. Parker, 128 Mass. 584, where land was devised on condition that the devisee should support his brother, although the support was no doubt a part of the consideration of the gift, yet it was limited by the life of the brother, there was the further intention manifest to benefit the devisee subject to the charge, and therefore the devise did not fail because of the previous death of the brother.

It follows from our construction of the second clause that the legacy to the Town must fail. Assuming that the object is a charity, still there is no universal principle that the testator's particular intentions must be sacrificed by reason of that general object. Stratton v. Physio-Medical College, 149 Mass. 505, 508, 5 L. R. A. 83; Re Ovey, L. R. 29 Ch. Div. 560; Re Randell, L. R. 88 Ch. Div. 218.

The limitation to the testatrix's "heirs-at-law" is not dependent upon the gift to the Town taking effect. It is a limitation upon the failure of the primary purpose at any time and for any cause. As the primary purpose fails at once, and as matter of law on the face of the will, the gift over is immediate, and is not open to any objection on the ground of the rule against perpetuity. Therefore the fund does not fall into the residue. As the gift is of money it will go to the next of kin. Codman v. Krell, 152 Mass. 214.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Albert PURCELL, Appt.,

v.

RICHMOND &amp; DANVILLE R. CO.

(....N. C....)

1. An action of tort will lie for a railroad company's breach of its statutory duty to stop at a station for a passenger.
2. Punitive damages are recoverable of a railroad company for disregard of its statutory duty to stop at a station for a passenger when it has advertised for passengers for that train and has room for them, or could by reasonable diligence have had cars enough to accommodate them.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Alamance County disallowing his claim to punitive damages because of defendant's failure to stop its train according to its schedule at a station at which plaintiff was waiting to take passage. Reversed.

At the close of the evidence plaintiff asked the court to charge the jury that if they believed that the defendant stopped its train at Mebane, and received and discharged passengers, and also at Graham, and there received twelve or fifteen passengers, and discharged two or three, and that there was then room, standing or sitting, for fifty or sixty persons at the time the train passed Haw River, and that a part of the tickets were sold to persons at Haw River the evening before, and in due time to communicate with the officers of the Company, then to run by, as shown in this action, is such willful disregard of the rights of the plaintiff as would entitle him to recover punitive damages. This prayer was refused and the court instructed the jury that, upon the testimony, they would not be warranted in finding the defendant guilty of such a degree of negligence as indicated a reckless indifference to consequences, oppression, needless caprice, willfulness or other cause of aggravation, as would entitle plaintiff to punitive damages. The measure of damages upon the admitted facts, or those proven, if the jury believed the testimony, would be the price paid for the ticket,—15 cents, and the amount paid for another conveyance to Burlington,—25 cents.

Mr. J. A. Long for appellant.

Messrs. D. Schenck and F. H. Busbee for appellee.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court: Code, § 1963, provides: "Every railroad corporation shall start and run their cars for the transportation of passengers and property at regular times, to be fixed by public notice, and shall furnish sufficient accommodation for the transportation of all such passengers and property as shall, within a reasonable time previous thereto, be offered for transportation at the place of starting and the junction of other railroads, and at usual stopping places established for receiving and discharging way passengers and freight for that train, and shall take, transport and discharge such passengers and property at, from and to such places on due payment of the freight or fare legally authorized therefor, and shall be liable to the party aggrieved in an action for damages for any neglect or refusal in the premises." For a violation of such statutory duty the plaintiff might have sued in contract (Hodges v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 105 N. C. 170), but he could elect to sue in tort for the injury, and the breach of public duty (existing independent of the Statute), by the willfulness or negligence of defendant. Bishop, Non-Cont. Law, §§ 73, 74.

If the tort was committed by mere negligence of the defendant, as simple carelessness or inadvertence, the plaintiff would be restricted to

Where the law imposes duties on a carrier a breach of performance of such duties is a tort for which the carrier is liable in damages. Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. Kemp, 61 Md. 619; *Clark v. If a contract imposes a legal duty on a person, the neglect of that duty is a tort founded on contract, for which an action ex contractu for the breach, or an action ex delicto for the breach of duties, may be brought at the option of the party aggrieved. 1 Addison, Torts, 27; Marzetti v. Williams, 1 Barn. & Ad. 423.

The class of tortious actions growing out of contracts does not arise from the breach of express provisions thereof, but from the breach of an implied duty arising out of and incident to the contract. 1 Addison, Torts, 27, note.

All duties imposed upon a corporation by statute raise an implied promise of performance. New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 84 N. Y. 85; Bath v. Freeport, 5 Mass. 326; *Bullard v. compensatory damages, and, as no special damages were alleged and shown, other than obtaining another conveyance, the measure of damages, as laid down by the court, to wit, the price of the ticket and of procuring such other conveyance, 40 cents in all, would have been correct. But if the conduct of the defendant was willful, or showed such gross negligence as to indicate a wanton disregard of the rights of the plaintiff, he was entitled to recover punitive damages in addition. Railroads are granted valuable franchises and privileges by virtue of the State's right of eminent domain. On their part they assume correlative obligations and duties to the public, and become quasi public servants. They are not granted such great and unusual privileges to the sole end that they may be operated for the mere pecuniary benefit of the corporation, and at the arbitrary pleasure and will of their managers and employé. It is well recognized that they are subject to proper regulation, supervision and control by public authority, and that they owe duties to the individuals who may wish to ship goods or to travel over their lines. When the defendant advertised its schedule, and the plaintiff bought a ticket and presented himself at the advertised time at a regular passenger station of the road, he had the right to be taken aboard the cars on their arrival at that point. In running its cars by the station without stopping, the defendant committed a breach of public duty,—a tort. If such breach was mere inadvertence or negligence, or was caused by an unforeseen number of passengers presenting themselves, which rendered it unsafe to take a greater number aboard, and the Company could not by reasonable diligence have increased the number of cars, then the plaintiff would be held to recover only the bare compensatory damages laid down. If, however, the defendant, having advertised for passengers for that train, by reasonable diligence could have ascertained that the number of cars was insufficient, and made no effort to supply the deficiency, but regardless of its duties, and of the rights of those whom it had invited to leave their ordinary avocations, and present themselves at its regular station for passage, ran its train by the station without stopping, or if there was room in the cars for fifty or sixty persons additional, and the train passed by the station without taking on at least as many as it had accommodations for, then the defendant did display a gross and willful disregard of the rights of the plaintiff which entitled him to recover punitive damages. There was evidence to justify, if believed, the state of facts recited in plaintiff's prayer for instruction, and it was error to refuse to grant it. Should an excessive verdict have been found by the jury, the discretion rested with the trial judge to correct it; but it would be a denial of justice to permit a common carrier to exhibit such arbitrary and willful neglect of the duties it has assumed, and such disregard of the rights of others. Yet such is the effect if, without adequate excuse, it should be allowed so to act, with no other penalty than refunding the price of the ticket and the price paid for another conveyance, since the latter would be demanded in very few cases, and only when the destination is at a short distance. The effect of such ruling would be to license the common carrier to furnish cars or not, and to stop at its regular stations or not, at its arbitrary pleasure, and not as a duty required by law. The refunding the price of the ticket would amount, in most cases, to nothing, as the passenger would usually buy a ticket by the next train. Yet the inconvenience, annoyance and injustice to the traveling public by such detentions would be great and difficult to estimate.

A case exactly in point is Harin v. McCaughan, 82 Miss. 17, where it is held that exemplary damages were recoverable against a common carrier (there a steam-boat company) in an action of tort for violation of duty in willfully refusing to land its vessel, and receive the plaintiff as a passenger, according to its advertisement.

In New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Hurst, 86 Miss. 660, which was a case somewhat similar, where the train ran by the regular station without stopping to put off (instead of to receive) a passenger, the court affirms the case last cited, and says it is "the right of the jury in such cases to protect the public, by punitive damages, against the negligence, folly or wickedness which might otherwise convert these great public blessings into the most dangerous nuisances."

It is the duty of a common carrier, especially where it has a monopoly, to provide sufficient cars for the transportation of all passengers, as well as for the carriage of all freight which its invitation naturally brings to it, as was held in Branch v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 77 N. C. 847. Indeed, the identical facts of the present case are cited by Judge Rodman as an hypothetical illustration in that opinion. Page 851. No regard for their own profits or convenience will justify the corporation in having only sufficient cars for the ordinary amount of freight and travel, leaving the public to bear the inconvenience and loss, when, on unusual occasions, the volume of business may swell beyond the average. Common carriers could not be held liable for an unforeseen and extraordinary rush of business not within reasonable calculation, but when the additional volume of travel or freight is such as, with reasonable foresight, could be expected, it is the duty of the company to have the extra cars furnished. With the modern facilities of telegraph and telephone, the occasion of an unusual number of passengers or quantity of freight can be promptly notified and provided for. If this is not done, it is gross and willful negligence, and the Company should not be allowed to find its profit in a willful and reckless disregard of the rights of the public, and of its own duties. It may be that on the whole testimony the defendant could show sufficient matter of excuse, but the plaintiff was entitled to have the phase of the evidence set out in his prayer for instruction presented to the jury. Taking that evidence to be true, and nothing else appearing, he was entitled to recover punitive damages.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

(....Iowa....)

1. The certificate of the judge that a transcript contains all the evidence will be accepted as true against an objection that the evidence is not all included, in the absence of any specific reference to show that fact.
2. Permission may be granted by an incorporated town, under Code, § 464, to a private person to place weighing scales in a street in front of his lots, where they will serve the public convenience and do not constitute an obstruction to travel.
3. A town is estopped from revoking permission to a person to place scales in a street in front of his lot until the interests of the public require a revocation, where on the faith of the permission he has purchased scales, and incurred other expenses, such as enlarging a building with which they were to be connected, for the purpose of preparing them for use.
4. The use by a firm of a privilege granted to one member to place scales in a street, where it was granted with the knowledge and expectation that it was to be used by the firm, is no ground for revoking the privilege.

(January 26, 1891.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Clay County in favor of defendants in a proceeding instituted to determine the right of defendants to set, maintain and use a weighing scale in plaintiff's Main Street, and to restrain them from so doing. Affirmed.

The case was submitted under a stipulation by which defendants waived the right to insist that plaintiff had a remedy at law. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hughes & Hastings and F. H. Helsell for appellee.

Given, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Appellees insist in argument that appellant has not made all the evidence taken on the trial of record, namely, Exhibit A and Exhibit No. 1, and that therefore the case cannot be tried de novo. We are not referred to any part of the six abstracts or of the transcript in support of this claim, but are left to search these several hundred pages to see what they show, if anything, as to these exhibits. In the absence of any specific reference, we conclude that we may rely upon the certificate of the judge that the transcript contains all the evidence, and therefore consider the case de novo.

2. The following statement of facts, with those hereafter mentioned, will be sufficient to a correct understanding of the questions presented: Defendant Andrew was the owner of two lots fronting on Main Street, upon which he and McQueen decided to erect a building in which to carry on the fuel and implement business. April 17, 1888, the petition of defendant Andrew for permission to put in a scale in Main Street in front of said lots was granted by the town council. Thereupon defendants ordered a street scale with levers and attachments, so that the scale-beam would be inside the building, and changed the construction of their building accordingly. On May 15, 1888, after the scale had been ordered and shipped and freight paid, the town council passed a resolution rescinding said permission, and caused notice thereof to be served on the defendant Andrew. Some attempt was made to arrive at an arrangement satisfactory to both parties, but, failing, the defendants proceeded to set their scale in the street, under the permission granted to Andrew. The principal conflict in the testimony is whether the scale is an obstruction to public travel. We may here say that the decided preponderance of the evidence is that the scale is not an obstruction or hindrance to public travel. The scale-beam is inside of the building, and connected by levers under the sidewalk, and no part of the scale shows upon the street except the platform, which is so substantial, and near the level of the street, that it can be safely and conveniently traveled over.

3. Our next inquiry is whether the Incorporated Town of Spencer had power to grant the permission given to the defendant Andrew. That the title to public streets and alleys is in the city or town in trust for the use of the public is not questioned. That other uses than travel may be made of the public streets and alleys is shown by numerous provisions of the Statute granting power to authorize other uses. The paramount purpose of maintaining streets and alleys is for public travel, and all other uses must be subordinate thereto. The city or town must keep them free from obstructions, except where the use or obstruction is such as the city or town is specifically empowered to and has authorized. Code, § 524; Heath v. Des Moines & St. L. R. Co. 61 Iowa, 11.

Among the powers conferred upon incorporated cities and towns is the right "to establish and regulate markets, to provide for the measuring or weighing of hay, coal or any other articles of sale." Code, § 456.

In Davis v. Anita, 73 Iowa, 835, the town authority of this provision passed an ordinance appointing a weighmaster, and providing a penalty for selling certain commodities within the town, when the quantity exceeded 1,000 barrels, without being weighed upon the city scales, and declaring a certain scale in the town to be "city scales." The court says, with reference to the power conferred, that "the power given, in substance, is to regulate; and this implies that the corporation is empowered to do all things essential to the proper exercise of the power expressly conferred. The privilege conferred should not be confined within narrow bounds, but the discretion reposed in the corporation must be fairly exercised, so as not to unduly infringe upon the rights of the citizen, on the one hand, and yet, on the other, so that the express and necessarily implied object of the Statute shall not be unduly limited. It is under the authority conferred by section 456 that many of the cities and towns have erected and maintained scales in the public streets. It is certainly the duty, as well as the privilege, of cities and towns to provide conveniences for the correct weighing or measuring of commodities brought to their markets. If the cities and towns may maintain scales of their own in the public streets to facilitate the weighing of hay, coal or other articles of sale, we see no good reason why they may not, under reasonable restrictions, authorize others to maintain scales whereby the public convenience will be served. If it may be said that this power is not delegated by statute, it is certainly included in the trust relation and purpose under which cities and towns hold title to and exercise control over the public streets and alleys.

In Emerson v. Babcock, 66 Iowa, 258, the plaintiff sought to restrain the defendant, the city marshal, from removing a set of scales. The petition alleged that the scales were not an obstruction, were a benefit to the public, and that they were put in the street at the first laying out of the town, and that the council had passed an ordinance requiring their removal. It was held, on demurrer, that the plaintiff had no legal right to carry on his private business in the streets; that his being permitted to maintain his scales for a time was a mere license which might be terminated at any time, and in such case it was immaterial whether the scales amounted to a nuisance or not; and hence that the demurrer was properly sustained. The distinction between the cases is obvious: In this, the scales were put in by permission, and evidently to serve the public need; in that, there was no permission, and the plaintiff was a trespasser. Our conclusion is that the Town of Spencer did have power to grant the permission it did.

4. Appellant contends that, although the council had power to grant the permission, "it was in effect a mere license, and as such was revocable at any time before an entry upon the premises, and possession taken thereunder, and expense incurred." Appellees contend that under the facts the plaintiff was estopped from revoking the permission at the time it was attempted to do so. We have seen that, before the attempted revocation, the defendants, relying upon the permission, had ordered a scale suited to the place, paid the freight thereon and had it shipped to them at Spencer. It also appears that the location requires grading, some of which was done, and that defendants enlarged the plan of their building so as to make room for the scale-beam on the inside.

These facts were known to the council at the time of the attempted revocation, and, under the familiar rules of the law, they were estopped from then revoking the permission. Appellees cite cases wherein licenses were held irrevocable, but we do not understand them to claim, nor would we hold, that this license must continue perpetually; for surely such was not contemplated by either party. The license having been granted by authority, and the defendants having acted thereon, as stated, the plaintiff is estopped from revoking it until the interests of the public shall require that it be revoked. If from any cause, such as change in the travel or business, the construction of a scale by the Town, or the condition or management of this scale, public interests require its removal, then the council may revoke the permission.

In Emerson v. Babcock, supra, where the scales were placed without permission, it was held that permission implied from allowing them to remain might be terminated at any time. The doctrine of estoppel had no application in that case. As no reason is shown for revoking the permission at the time the resolution of revocation was passed, we think the council were not authorized to revoke it.

5. The permission being to Andrew alone, appellant contends that it confers no privilege upon the firm of Andrew & McQueen. It is evident that the privilege was granted with the knowledge and expectation that it was to be used by the firm. Authorities are cited as to the difference between the rights of a partnership and of those composing it. It is a sufficient answer to appellant's claim that the mere fact that the firm of which Andrew is a member is exercising the privilege is not a sufficient reason for granting the relief asked.

This discussion fully disposes of the case, and leads to the conclusion that the judgment of the District Court should be affirmed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE of the State of California, ex rel., ATTORNEY-GENERAL, Appt.,

v.

DASHAWAY ASSOCIATION.

(84 Cal. 114.)

The promotion of the cause of temperance is too vague and uncertain as a description of the objects for which a corporation was formed to enable a court to say that funds contributed for the use of the corporation constitute a public charity which can be administered by a court of equity. Hence a division of the fund by the corporation among its own members is not such a perversion thereof as amounts to an injury to the public so as to demand a forfeiture of the corporate charter.

(May 10, 1890.)

A PPEAL by relator from a judgment of the A Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco, sustaining a demurrer to an information filed to procure the forfeiture of the charter of defendant corporation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George A. Johnson, Atty-Gen., S. Heydenfeldt, Jr., Walter H. Levy and J. P. Kelly for appellant.

Messrs. Tilden & Tilden and McClure & Dwinelle for respondent.

Per Curiam:

This is an information in the nature of a quo warranto to forfeit the charter of the Dashaway Association, a corporation organized and existing under the Laws of the State of California, and for a judgment declaring that its property escheat to the State; that a receiver be appointed to take possession of all the property; that an injunction issue, etc.

The complaint avers that the object and purpose for which the said corporation was formed was to promote the cause of temperance; that it has no capital stock; that it has members who are elected under provisions of its by-laws; that it has since its incorporation received at various times from its members and others contributions and donations of money for the purpose for which it was incorporated, to wit., the promotion of the cause of temperance; with which moneys it acquired by purchase real estate in the City and County of San Francisco.

That in 1888, by leave of the court, it sold certain real estate in said city and county for $156,000; that it paid off a mortgage of $45,000, leaving a balance in cash on hand of $111,000, realized from property purchased with donations as aforesaid and for the purposes aforesaid.

That the corporation has abused and misused its powers, disregarded its corporate trust, and violated its charter, and has fraudulently and unlawfully perverted its funds and misapplied $72,000, from the object for which the corporation was formed, and from the use for which it was given and received, by dividing, distributing and paying out the same among its members.

That the officers and members have conspired and colluded with defendant to fraudulently and unlawfully accomplish this result, and that the corporation has still the sum of $89,000 on hand received in like manner and for like purpose, which, as relator is informed, it will dispose of in like unlawful manner unless restrained.

Defendant demurred to the information upon the grounds:

1. "That the said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

2. "That the said court has no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant or the subject of the action."

The demurrer was sustained by the court below "on the ground that the court has no jurisdiction."

Judgment was entered in favor of defendant, from which judgment relator appeals to this court.

Corporations are creatures of the law, and when they fail to perform duties which they were incorporated to perform, and in which the public have an interest, or do acts which are not authorized, or are forbidden them to do, the State may forfeit their franchises and dissolve them by an information in the nature of a quo warranto. People v. Utica Ins. Co. 15 Johns. 358; People v. Pittsburgh R. Co. 53 Cal. 694; Golden Rule v. People, 118 Ill. 492, 7 West. Rep. 219.

The grant of corporate franchises is always subject to the implied condition that they will not be abused. Chicago Life Ins. Co. v. Needles, 118 U. S. 574, 28 L. ed. 1084.

"In its relations to the government, and when the acts or neglects of a corporation, in violation of its charter or of the general law, become the subject of public inquiry, with a view to the forfeiture of its charter, the willful acts and neglects of its officers are regarded as the acts and neglects of the corporation, and render the corporation liable to a judgment or decree of dissolution." Ang. & A. Corp. § 310; Life & Fire Ins. Co. v. Mechanics Ins. Co. 7 Wend. 85; Bank Commissioners v. Bank of Buffalo, 6 Paige, 497, 8 L. ed. 1076; Ward v. Sea Ins. Co. 7 Paige, 294, 4 L. ed. 162.

This reasoning proceeds upon the theory that the corporation is cognizant of and approves of the acts of its agents, and where it is made to appear that the agent has departed from his duties as prescribed by the corporation, or violated his instructions in the performance of the acts complained of and relied upon as a basis for forfeiture, no such forfeiture will be declared. State v. Manchester Commercial Bank, 6 Smedes & M. 267.

In People v. Utica Ins. Co., supra, an application had been previously made by the attorney-general to a court of chancery for an injunction to restrain the company from usurping the franchise of banking, which application was refused because there was a complete and adequate remedy at law, by an information in the nature of a quo warranto.

People v. Bank of Niagara, 6 Cow. 196; People v. Washington and Warren Bank, 6 Cow. 211, and People v. Bank of Hudson, 6 Cow. 217,—are authority to the point that the action is properly brought in the name of the People, and against the corporations in their corporate names, in cases where they had, as corporations, usurped franchises not granted by their charters. See also People v. Trustees of Geneva College, 5 Wend. 211.

The writ of certio facias was formerly used by government as a mode to ascertain and enforce the forfeiture of a corporate charter, in cases where there was a legal existing body, capable of acting, but who had abused their power. It would not lie in cases of mere de facto corporations. It was necessary that the government be a party to the suit, for the judgment was that the parties be ousted and the franchises seized into the hands of the government. 2 Kent, Com. 318.

The writ of quo warranto was a writ which issued to bring the defendant before the court to show by what authority he claimed an office or franchise, and was applicable alike to cases where the defendant never had a right, or where, having a right or franchise, he had forfeited it by neglect or abuse. 8 Bl. Com. 262, 263.

An information in the nature of quo warranto, which has succeeded the writ of that name, was originally in form a criminal proceeding, to punish the usurpation of the franchise by a fine, as well as to seize the franchise. This information has in process of time become in substance a civil proceeding to try the mere right to the franchise or office.

It was a peculiarity of both the quo warranto and information in the nature of quo warranto that the ordinary rule of pleading was reversed, and the State was bound to show nothing, and the defendant was required to show his right to the franchise or office in question; and if he failed to show authority judgment went against him. Ang. & A. Corp. § 756.

The practice has, however, become quite general in this country for the information to set forth the facts relied upon to show the intrusion, misuser or non-user complained of.

In information of quo warranto there were two forms of judgment: When against an officer or individual, the judgment was ouster; when against a corporation by its corporate name, the judgment was ouster and seizure.

In the first case, there being no franchise forfeited, there is none to seize; in the second case there is; consequently the franchise is seized. 2 Kent, Com. 312, and note.

But there may be a judgment of ouster of a particular franchise, and not of the whole charter. People v. Rensselaer & S. R. Co. 15 Wend. 118.

By such ouster and seizure the franchises are not destroyed, but pass to and exist in the State. The corporation was destroyed and ceased to be the owner or possessor of lands, or goods, or rights, or credits. The lands reverted to the grantor and his heirs, and the goods escheated to the State.

The principle of a forfeiture is, that the franchise is a trust; and the terms of the charter are conditions of the trust, and if any one of the conditions of the trust be violated it will work a forfeiture of the charter.

Cases of forfeiture are said to be divided into two great classes:

1. Cases of perversion; as where a corporation does an act inconsistent with the nature and destructive of the ends and purposes of the grant. In such cases unless the perversion is such as to amount to an injury to the public who are interested in the franchise, it will not work a forfeiture.

2. Cases of usurpation, as where a corporation exercises a power which it has no right to exercise. In this last case the question of forfeiture is not dependent, as in the former, upon any interest or injury to the public.

We have referred in a general way to the modes of procedure under these several writs and the nature of the relief granted under them, for a purpose which will become apparent when we look into the following provisions of our Code:

Section 802 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1872 provides as follows:

"The writ of scire facias of quo warranto and proceedings by information in the nature of quo warranto, are abolished. The remedies obtainable in these forms may hereafter be obtained by civil actions, under the provisions of this chapter."

Then follow the provisions of the chapter from sections 808 to 809, both inclusive, providing for an action by the attorney-general in the name of the people of the State, against any person who usurps, intrudes into or unlawfully holds or exercises any public office, civil or military, or any franchise within this State.

This was the condition of our law until 1879, when the present Constitution of the State went into effect, the fifth section of article 6 of which authorizes the superior courts and their judges to issue writs of quo warranto; and in 1890 the Code of Civil Procedure was amended to conform in this respect to the Constitution. Code Civ. Proc. § 76.

If, then, it be contended that the effect of the Constitution, and amendment to section 76, of 12 L. R. A.

the Code of Civil Procedure, reviving the writ of quo warranto, is to repeal by implication the chapter providing for an action against persons who usurp offices or franchises, the answer must be that it makes little difference, as the power under a writ of quo warranto is quite as broad as under the Statute.

The mode of proceeding under the several writs we have mentioned has not in modern times been very uniform, and we regard the information or complaint in this case sufficient in its general scope to uphold a proceeding like the present, whether brought under the Statute, or in support of a writ of quo warranto.

We say sufficient in its general scope, in the view that it will uphold the one equally with the other.

We are clearly of opinion that the proper parties are before the court, the nature of the relief sought considered.

The vital question, however, remaining in either case is this:

Has there been a perversion by the defendant of its funds under such circumstances as to amount to an injury to the public?

We have already said that in cases of perversion the acts must result in injury to the public who are interested in the franchise, or no forfeiture will be declared. Has the public such an interest here, and has it been injured?

The information avers "that the object and purpose for which the said corporation was formed was to promote the cause of temperance."

That it has received moneys contributed and donated by its members and other persons for "the promotion of the cause of temperance."

These are the only allegations touching the objects of the Association, the scope of its action and the manner of its achievement.

Whether temperance in eating, in drinking, or temperance generally and in all things, is meant, is not stated and must be left to conjecture.

Whether its operations and efforts are confined to members of the Association, or extended to those outside of the pale of the society, does not appear.

In Saltontail v. Sanders, 11 Allen, 446, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts upheld as a public charity a residuary bequest for the following purposes: (1) "to the furtherance and promotion of the cause of piety and good morals;" or (2) "in aid of objects and purposes of benevolence or charity, public or private;" or (3) "temperance;" or (4) "for the education of deserving youths." In reference to the third clause, relating to the bequest, viz., that for the furtherance and promotion of temperance, another portion of the will indicated so unmistakably the meaning of the testator that the court says that the term "temperance" "is shown by the previous clause above quoted to have been used by the testator in its modern and limited sense of restraining the abuse of intoxicating liquors." That a bequest for the purpose of being used by a trustee for the cause of temperance, in restraining the abuse of intoxicating liquors, is a public charity, and may be upheld as such, we do not doubt.

So, too, we are fully alive to the fact that upon the construction of general charitable bequests, "if there are two meanings of a word, one of which will effectuate and the other will defeat the testator's object, the court is bound to select that meaning of the word which will carry out the intention and objects of the testator."

The enforcement of charitable uses cannot be limited to any narrow and stated formula. As has been well said, it must expand with the advancement of civilization and the daily increasing needs of men. New discoveries in science, new fields and opportunities for human action, the differing condition, character and wants of communities and nations, change and enlarge the scope of charity, and where new necessities are created new charitable uses must be established. The underlying principle is the same; its application is as varying as the wants of humanity.

Public charities have often been enforced in cases lacking in that definiteness essential to uphold a bequest to individuals.

It does not follow, however, that we can by adjudication give a definite meaning to language which, standing by itself, or in connection with its context, has only a general significance, incapable of limitation.

The word "temperance" has no fixed legal meaning as contradistinguished from its usual import.

Webster defines it as "habitual moderation in regard to the indulgence of the natural appetites and passions; restrained or moderate indulgence; moderation, as, temperance in eating and drinking; temperance in the indulgence of joy or mirth."

Where a testator bequeathed the residue of her estate to the Bishop of D. to dispose of the same "to such objects of benevolence and liberality as the Bishop in his own discretion shall most approve of," the bequest was held void upon the ground that objects of benevolence and liberality were not necessarily charitable within the Statute of Elizabeth, and were, therefore, too indefinite to be executed. Morice v. Durham, 9 Ves. Jr. 399.

Upon the like ground a bequest "for the relief of domestic distress, assisting indigent but deserving individuals, or encouraging undertakings of general utility," has been held void for vagueness and uncertainty, and as not being within the scope of the Statute of Elizabeth. Kendall v. Granger, 5 Beav. 800.

We are of opinion that the term used in the information here is too vague and uncertain to enable us to say therefrom that the fund in question is a public charity, which can be administered by a court of equity.

It follows that the perversion of the fund is not an injury to the public, and hence that the forfeiture cannot be maintained.

Fox, J., deeming himself disqualified, did not participate in this decision.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

In the Roman law it was declared that a promise made to effect a base purpose, as to commit homicide or sacrilege, is not binding. 3 Just. Inst. title 12, § 24.

In modern jurisprudence a contract may be illegal and void because contrary to law, or inconsistent with sound policy and good morals; and "many contracts which are not against morality are still void as being against the maxims of sound policy." Lord Mansfield, in Jones v. Randall, 1 Cowp. 39.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enforce specific performance of a contract alleged to have been made by defendants' ancestor. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. U. J. Hammond and Edwin St. George Rogers, for appellant:

An agreement to settle, or charge, or dispose of, or leave one's property at one's death, is a good and available agreement, and will operate and can be enforced in equity on the property when such time arrives and finds the party who so agrees of ability to carry out such agreement with respect to such property, or finds the property in any claimant of it who has not acquired it bona fide for a valuable consideration without notice of the agreement.

Metcalfe v. York, 1 Myl. & C. 547, 556; Lyde v. Mynn, 1 Myl. & K. 688; Wellesley v. Wellesley, 4 Myl. & C. 561; Lewis v. Madocks, 17 Ves. Jr. 48.

Although such an agreement may fail to be couched in such terms as that it interferes with one's power to dispose of and expend such property during one's lifetime, yet it does not for this reason fail to prevent him from making such a disposition of the property as is, in form or effect, testamentary, or as does not end in his lifetime his own enjoyment or use of the property.

See Lewis v. Madocks, 8 Ves. Jr. 158, note; Cochran v. Graham, 19 Ves. Jr. 66, note; Eyre v. Monro, 26 L. J. Ch. N. S. 757; Needham v. Kirkman, 8 Barn. & Ald. 581; Gregor v. Brinker, 7 Pa. 53.

When the evidence concerning such an agreement is not so uncertain as to fail to show any definite arrangement in regard to the matter, and where the agreement has been performed on the part of the promisee, and where there is no objection to the agreement on account of the adequacy of the consideration, and no circumstance rendering the claim under it inequitable, it is the province of equity not only to compel a specific performance of the agreement, but, if necessary, charge anyone coming to hold the property with knowledge of the agreement, or otherwise than as a bona fide against public policy. Maloney v. Herbert (N. J.) Nov. 8, 1888; Bowman v. Phillips, 8 L. R. A. 681, and note, 41 Kan. 384; Tappan v. Albany Brewing Co. 5 L. R. Contract if illegal cannot be ratified.

A contract void because it stipulates for the doing what is forbidden by law at the time when it is to be done cannot be ratified, even at a time when, owing to a change in the law, it would be lawful to do the thing. Handy v. St. Paul Globe Pub. Co. 4 L. R. A. 466, and note, 41 Minn. 188.

Mr. T. S. Rollins for appellees.

Coffey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint in this cause consists of three paragraphs. The material allegations in the first paragraph are, substantially, that in the year 1868, when the appellant was four years of age, John S. Johnson and Elizabeth D.

Johnson, husband and wife, without children and residing in the City of Indianapolis, proposed, in writing, to the mother of the appellant, then living alone with the appellant at the Town of Neoga, in the State of Illinois, that if the said mother would surrender to them the appellant they would take her as their own child, provide for her and bring her up as their own, and at their death leave her all their property; that said proposition was contained in a letter written to the mother of the appellant by the said Elizabeth D. Johnson and signed by her for her said husband, John S. Johnson and herself; that the letter is lost and a copy cannot be filed with the complaint; that said proposition was accepted and the custody of appellant surrendered to the said Johnson and Johnson; that in the year 1869, said John S. Johnson, by proceedings in the proper court, adopted the appellant as his daughter and she thereupon took upon herself the name of Johnson; that the said Elizabeth Johnson was present in court at the time said proceedings were had and gave her assent thereto and thereafter promised the mother of the appellant that she would treat appellant as her daughter; that thereafter the appellant remained with said Johnson and Johnson, rendering them all the duties, affection and obedience due from a natural child, until she was eighteen years of age, when, with their consent and approval, she intermarried with Charles Austin, which them, is against public policy and void. Wheeler v. Wheeler, 5 Lans. 355.

After appointment to office by agreement between two parties to share the profits of the office in consideration of the withdrawal of the candidacy of one of the parties a renewal of the promise by the incumbent is void. Hunter v. Nolf, 71 Pa. 232.

An agreement to pay for lobbying a private bill through Congress cannot be validated by ratification and new promise to pay for the service. McKee v. Cheney, 52 How. Fr. 144. See Pearson v. Chapin, 44 Pa. 9.

Where one withdrew his candidacy in favor of another, who agreed to pay all expenses already incurred, a new promise to pay, made after the election, was void. Robinson v. Kalbfleisch, 5 Thomp. & C. 212. Compare, however, Stout v. Ennis, 28 Kan. 705.

No number of subsequent promises to pay can infuse vitality into a contract originally void by the policy of the law. Fireman's Charitable Assn. v. Berghaus, 13 La. Ann. 209; Negley v. Lindsay, 67 Pa. 217; Shelton v. Marshall, 16 Tex. 344; Chamberlain v. McClurg, 8 Watts & S. 31.

A transaction between enemies, originally unlawful, cannot be made better by ratification. United States v. Grossmayer, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 72, 19 L. ed. 627.

The reason of the rule is, that the public have an interest in the contract, on the ground of public policy, which the immediate parties to the contract are not at liberty to control by an attempted ratification. See Wight v. Rindskopf, 43 Wis. 348; Reeves v. Butcher, 81 N. J. L. 227.

Courts will not take jurisdiction in cases of illegal contracts.

No principle is better settled than that no action can be maintained on a contract, the consideration of which is either wicked in itself or prohibited by law. Armstrong v. Toier, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 271, 6 L. ed. 472; Kimbrow v. Bullitt, 63 U. S. 22 How. 209, 12 L. R. A.

R. 61; Craft v. McConoughy, 79 Ill. 846; Western Union Teleg. Co. v. Burlington & S. W. R. Co. 11 Fed. Rep. 1. See note to Bowman v. Phillips (Kan.) 3 L. R. A. 681.

That which the law prohibits, either in terms or by fixing a penalty to it, is unlawful; and it will not permit in one form that which it declares wrong in another,—as a contract for the loan of money to be used in gambling or other transactions in contravention of the Statute (White v. Bus, 3 Cush. 448; McKenna v. Robinson, 3 Mees. & W. 434. See Webb v. Brooke, 3 Taunt. 6; Cannan v. Bryce, 3 Barn. & Ald. 179; or where spirituous liquors were sold by one having no license, and the Statute requires a license (Griffith v. Wells, 3 Denio, 226; Solomon v. Dreschler, 1 Minn. 373); or a partnership agreement one object of which was to deal in the illegal sale of lottery tickets (Williams v. Woodman, 8 Pick. 78); or where a part consideration of attorneys' fees for professional services was the division of the fees contrary to the provision of the statute. Allen v. Hawke, 18 Pick. 79.

Parties in pari delicto.

Parties in pari delicto are without remedy, whether the transactions are mala prohibita or malum in se. Brown v. Tarkington, 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 377, 18 L. ed. 255; James v. Steers, 2 L. R. A. 164, 16 R. I. 367; Hess v. Culver, 6 L. R. A. 493, 7 Mich. 538. See note to Kirkpatrick v. Clark (Ill.) 8 L. R. A. 511.

Where an unlawful object, known to both parties, was intended as part of a contract to commit a fraud, as to sell domestic sardines in boxes with French labels, the courts will not aid either party. Materne v. Horwitz, 2 Cent. Rep. 473, 101 N. Y. 493.

Contracts in violation of the Statute of Frauds not enforceable.

If the requirements of the Statute of Frauds are not complied with, a contract falling within its marriage occurred in the year 1882, and that during the time she so lived with them she was treated as their daughter; that the said John S. Johnson departed this life on the 6th day of April, 1887, having disposed of his property to the said Elizabeth D. Johnson while yet in life and leaving no children except the appellant; that the said Elizabeth D. Johnson at all times up to the time of her death treated the appellant as her daughter, and declared that she desired the appellant to have all her property after her death; that the said Elizabeth D. Johnson died intestate on the 8th day of March, 1888, leaving no issue of her body nor the descendants of any issue; but leaving the appellant, whom she had up to the time of her death reared, trained and loved and held out to the world as her child, and whom she had declared up to the time of her death she desired to take and have all her property both real and personal; that the appellees claim to be the heirs of the said Elizabeth D. Johnson, and deny the right of the appellant to any portion of the property owned by the said Elizabeth at the time of her death. This paragraph contains a description of the real estate owned by Elizabeth D. Johnson at the time of her death, and alleges that the personal estate amounts to the sum of $900, and prays that the right of the appellee to said property be ascertained and fixed by a proper decree.

The second paragraph of the complaint, in legal effect, does not differ materially from the first paragraph, except in that it alleges that Elizabeth D. Johnson was in court at the time the record was made adopting the appellant by John S. Johnson and believed herself to be a party thereto and to be bound thereby, and that she died in that belief; that the property conveyed by John S. Johnson to his wife, the said Elizabeth D. Johnson, was a voluntary conveyance and without any consideration whatever; and at the time she took the same she had full knowledge of the obligations of the said John S. Johnson to the appellant under the terms of said contract.

No question is made in this court in relation to the third paragraph of the complaint, and we need not, for that reason, state its contents.

The circuit court sustained a demurrer to each paragraph of the complaint, and the propriety of that ruling is called in question by a proper assignment of error.

This is not an action by the appellant to recover damages for a breach of the contract set up in the complaint; nor is it an action to recover the value of services rendered by the appellant to John S. Johnson and Elizabeth D. Johnson; but the complaint is constructed upon the theory that the appellant is entitled to specific performance. It has been decided by this court that where a childless husband and wife, in consideration that a young girl should live with them until the death of both, in all respect, as long as it remains in fieri, cannot be enforced, either at law or in equity. Andrews Bros. Co. v. Youngstown Coke Co. 89 Fed. Rep. 353.

An interest in an irrigating ditch is an interest in realty which cannot pass by mere verbal sale. Barnham v. Freeman, 11 Colo. 601.

A parol promise made by a woman to her adult daughter to reconvey property on the arrival of minors at maturity, on certain conditions, if the daughter would convey title to her, is void under the Statute. Cleaman v. Cotton, 66 Miss. 467.

Statements of a person, since deceased, that another had done a good many things for him, and that he was going to leave him a certain sum in his will, do not establish a contract liability, but are only a declaration of decedent that he intended to give a legacy of that sum. Re Miller's Estate, 136 Pa. 230.

Mere statements to third persons by a person since deceased, that he intended to devise a certain sum to another for services, do not establish a binding contract enforceable against decedent's estate, especially where there is no proof that the services were actually rendered. Ibid.

A promise to make provision by will for payment for services rendered before the promise is not enforceable against the promisor's estate, after his death, as a contract on the faith of which actual services were performed. Ibid.

A letter to a sister in England asking to have some relative come to the writer, so that in case of his death his property will not be eaten up by outsiders, and a subsequent telegram to a nephew, but not received till after his uncle's death, saying, "Come at once if you wish to see me alive; property is yours; answer immediately,"—do not constitute a contract in writing which will give the nephew a right to the uncle's real estate. Turner v. Prevost, 17 Can. S. C. 253.

The services of a child to its parent, or of a grandchild to whom the grandparent stands in loco parentis, to such grandparent, are not gratuitous, but are presumed, in the absence of evidence of an express promise, to be rendered as a recompense 12 L. R. A.

for the care and protection extended to the child. Dodson v. McAdams, 96 N. C. 149.

Secret agreement, when void.

When one acts with others in a matter of common interest and apparently upon an equality, his signature being used to induce others to sign, a secret promise for his individual advantage with the promoter of the enterprise is void and a new agreement may be so connected with it as to be tainted with the illegality. Nickerson v. English, 2 New Eng. Rep. 632, 142 Mass. 267, citing Harvey v. Hunt, 119 Mass. 279; White Mountain R. Co. v. Eastman, 34 N. H. 494; Melvin v. Lamar Ins. Co. 80 Ill. 446; Robinson v. Pittsburgh & O. R. Co. 23 Pa. 384; Miller v. Hanover Junction & S. R. Co. 87 Pa. 96; Henry v. Vermillion & A. R. Co. 17 Ohio, 187; Stanhope's Case, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 161.

Part performance, to take contract out of the Statute.

To take a case out of the Statute of Frauds upon the ground of part performance of a parol contract, it is not only indispensable that the acts done should be clear and definite, and referable exclusively to the contract, but the contract should be established by clear, definite, competent and unequivocal proofs. Berry v. Hartzell, 8 West. Rep. 309, 91 Mo. 132.

Part performance of a parol contract which the Statute of Frauds requires to be in writing has no effect at law to take a case out of the provisions of the Statute. Henry v. Wells, 48 Ark. 485.

Part performance must have been made in reliance upon the oral agreement, and to the prejudice of the party seeking to enforce the contract. Brown v. Hoag, 36 Minn. 373.

The acts of part performance should clearly appear to be done solely with a view to the agreement being performed. Wheeler v. Reynolds, 66 N. Y. 238; Johnson v. Skillman, 29 Minn. 99; Wolfe v. Frost, 4 Sandf. Ch. 72, 7 L. ed. 1027; Wheeler v. Reynolds, 66 N. Y. 232; Byrne v. Ro-maine, 2 Edw. Ch. 444, 6 L. ed. 451.

spects as their own child, and render such services as she was capable of doing, orally agreed to make her their heir, and at their death, or the death of the survivor, to will her the entire estate of which they were possessed, consisting, at the death of the survivor, of real estate, and also of personal property exceeding in value $50, the agreement was within the Statute of Frauds, and that a performance on the part of the girl did not take it out of the Statute. Wallace v. Long, 105 Ind. 523, 8 West. Rep. 370, and authorities there cited.

It is sought by the complaint before us to take the case at bar out of the rule announced in this case by alleging that the contract was embodied in a letter written to the mother of the appellant. If a contract which comes within the Statute of Frauds can be extracted from correspondence between the parties upon the subject of the contract, the Statute is satisfied. Wills v. Ross, 77 Ind. 1; Thames Loan & Trust Co. v. Beville, 100 Ind. 309.

The allegations in relation to the letter resulting in the contract set up in the complaint are somewhat vague and uncertain. We are left in doubt as to whether the name of John S. Johnson was signed to the letter which it is alleged was written by appellant's mother. It is not alleged that John S. Johnson wrote the letter, but the allegation is that it was written by his wife and signed by her for her husband and herself. Assuming, however, that the letter was of such a character as to bind John S. Johnson, we are confronted with the question as to what were his duties and obligations under the terms of the contract contained therein. It bound him to leave to the appellant whatever property he might possess at the time of his death. This he could do in two ways, namely: first, by adopting the appellant so that she would take the property by inheritance from him; second, by the execution of a will in proper legal form so as to bequeath to her his property. He chose to adopt the first mode, but before his death he conveyed and transferred, or caused to be conveyed and transferred, all his property to his wife, Elizabeth D. Johnson, and at the time of his death had no property which the appellant could inherit from him.

All the authorities agree that such contract as the one now under consideration left John S. Johnson perfectly free and unrestrained in the enjoyment of his property, and that he could dispose of it as he pleased at any time during his life by gift or otherwise. Van Dyne v. Freeland, 12 N. J. Eq. 146; Jeremy, Eq. 1st Am. ed. 401; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 382.

It is not claimed that the transfer made by John S. Johnson to his wife was made for the purpose of defrauding the appellant; and we must presume, therefore, that it was made in good faith and for some lawful purpose. Under these facts it cannot be successfully maintained that John S. Johnson was guilty of any breach of the contract set out in the complaint. Nor are we able to perceive how it can be successfully maintained, by any process of legitimate reasoning, that the property of John S. Johnson became charged with any trust, since he was at liberty to dispose of it at his pleasure. Ordinarily, one who holds property in trust for another must keep it for the benefit of the cestui que trust. It would be idle to say that one has the legal right to dispose of his property in such manner as to him seemed best, even in making a donation of it, and at the same time say that the person taking it took it subject to a trust which might, in certain contingencies, be enforced. We are not inclined to adopt the contention of the appellant that the property of John S. Johnson became charged with a trust in favor of the appellant, and that Elizabeth D. Johnson took it subject to such trust.

As John S. Johnson possessed the undoubted right to dispose of his property, we think his wife took the absolute title to the same free from any charge against it on account of any contract made by him with the appellant. And this brings us to a consideration of the obligations and duties of Elizabeth D. Johnson under the contract in suit. At the time the contract was entered into she was a married woman, and the contract as to her was void for want of power in her to bind herself by such a contract. Long v. Brown, 66 Ind. 160; Hudson v. Davis, 48 Ind. 253; O'Daily v. Morris, 31 Ind. 111; Johnson v. Tusweiler, 35 Ind. 355; Maher v. Martin, 43 Ind. 814.

It is contended by the appellant that under the facts stated in the complaint it must be held that Mrs. Johnson, after she ceased to be a married woman, ratified the contract made by her while under coverture, or that she made a new contract. It appears by the complaint that the appellant became a married woman prior to the death of John S. Johnson; and while it does appear that she, subsequent to his death, resided with Mrs. Johnson, under the same roof, she could not occupy that relation which she occupied prior to her marriage. Furthermore, it is a general principle of law that a void contract cannot be ratified, and this principle has been held to apply to the contracts of married women. Long v. Brown, supra.

In this case it was said by this court, speaking of the contracts of a married woman then in suit: "Such contract is not susceptible of ratification. Nothing short of a new, valid and binding contract, made after the death of her husband, upon a new consideration, can operate as a contract to deprive her of her interest in the land."

It is not claimed that Elizabeth D. Johnson made any new written contract after the death of her husband. If she made any contract at all, it was a verbal one. As we have seen, such a contract is within the Statute of Frauds, and cannot be enforced. Wallace v. Long, supra.

The appellant relies upon the case of Van Tine v. Van Tine (N. J.), 1 L. R. A. 155, and the case of Sharkey v. McDermott, 16 Mo. App. 80, 91 Mo. 647. In each of these cases it was held that performance on the part of the child was sufficient part performance to take the case out of the Statute of Frauds. This is in direct conflict with Wallace v. Long, supra, and Johns v. Johns, 67 Ind. 440. We cannot follow the case of Van Tine v. Van Tine, and the case of Sharkey v. McDermott, without overruling the case of Wallace v. Long, and the cases upon which it rests. To hold that specific performance could be had in this case, as to the real estate of which Mrs. Johnson died seized there being no valid written contract between the appellant and Mrs. Johnson, and no possession of such real estate having been surrendered under the contract, would also be in conflict with the cases of Atkinson v. Jackson, 8 Ind. 31; Watson v. Mahan, 20 Ind. 223; Le-Follett v. Kyle, 51 Ind. 446; Law v. Henry, 39 Ind. 414; Stater v. Hill, 10 Ind. 176; Moreland

v. Lemasters, 4 Blackf. 383, and Arnold v. Stephenson, 79 Ind. 196.

In our opinion, the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint before us. Judgment affirmed.

Petition for rehearing overruled June 12, 1891.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

William MISCH, Appt.,

v.

Horace RUSSELL.

1. Officers of school districts are included in the words "all other officers," in the Act of April 3, 1873 (Rev. Stat. chap. 46), giving the county court jurisdiction of contests of election of county, township and precinct officers and all other officers for the contest of whose election no provision is made.
2. By application of the maxim ejusdem generis, which is only an illustration or specific application of the broader maxim notetur a sociis, general and specific words which are capable of an analogous meaning being associated together take color from each other so that the general words are restricted to a sense analogous to the less general, but the rule does not require the entire rejection of the general terms.
3. An elector may lawfully vote for the same man as a candidate for two incompatible offices at the same election.

(January 22, 1891.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the County Court for Iroquois County dismissing his petition in a proceeding instituted to contest the election of defendant to the office of president of the board of education of a certain school district. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kay, Evans & Kay for appellant.
Mr. Free P. Morris for appellee.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a proceeding brought by William Misch in the County Court of Iroquois County, to contest the election of Horace Russell to the office of president of the board of education of school district No. 2, township 25 north, of range 12 west, in said county. The petition alleges that said Misch is a resident of said school district, over the age of twenty-one years, and able to read and write the English language; that on the 19th day of April, 1890, an election was held in said school district for the purpose of electing a board of education, to consist of a president and six members, as provided in section 2, art. 6, of the "Act to Establish and Maintain a System of Free Schools," approved and in force May 21, 1889; that at said election there were cast at least 212 votes; that the result of said election, as declared by the judges thereof, gave to said Russell 96 votes and to said Misch 95 votes, for the office of president of said board of education, and that said Russell was thereupon declared by said judges elected to said office; that said Russell did not in fact receive a majority of the votes cast at said election for said office, but that said Misch did receive a majority of said votes, and was actually elected; that there were cast at said election not less than 10 ballots which were not counted by said judges; that said ballots were headed "For President, William Misch," and thereunder, among the names of the candidates voted for as members of said board, there also appeared the name of said Misch; that said judges did not count any of said last-mentioned ballots; and that, if said ballots had been counted for said Misch as president of said board, he would have received a majority of all the votes cast for that office, and would have been declared elected thereto. Said Russell appeared and answered, alleging that said county court had no jurisdiction of the subject matter of said petition or power to hear and determine the matters therein set forth, but admitting that said Misch was properly qualified to be elected to and hold the office of president of said board of education; that an election was held in said school district, as alleged in said petition, and that at said election about 212 votes were actually cast; that the judges of said election counted 96 votes in favor of said Russell and 95 votes in favor of said Misch for the office of president of said board, and declared said Russell elected to said office; that at said election there were cast about ten ballots in which it appeared that the voters had voted for said Misch for president of said board and also for a member of said board; that said judges held that, inasmuch as said Misch could not hold both of said offices, they being incompatible with each other, and contrary to the spirit and intention of said Act, they, the said judges, did not have the power to discriminate as to which of said offices they

NORM.—Voting for same person for incompatible offices.

This appears to be the first case upon the question as to an elector's right to vote for the same person as a candidate for incompatible offices. It is decided, however, in harmony with the doctrine as to appointments to incompatible offices or the election of an incumbent of one office to another 13 L. R. A.

and incompatible office, in which cases the appointment or election is not void but simply puts the candidate to an election as to which office he will hold (see People v. Carrigue, 2 Hill, 98; State v. Butts, 28 C. 156), unless some law positively forbids a person holding one office from accepting another. See Re Corlies, 11 R. L. 633; State v. De Gress, 53 Tex. 387.

should count said votes for, did therefore reject them altogether, and thereupon declared that said Misch had received 95 votes for said office, and that said Russell had received 96 votes therefor, and that said Russell was elected to said office. The answer alleges that said president and the members of said board declared elected afterwards met and organized as required by law. The cause being heard on petition and answer, the county court held that it had no jurisdiction of the subject matter of said contest, and for that reason dismissed the petition. From that judgment the petitioner has appealed to this court.

The first question, then, to be considered is whether the county court decided correctly in holding that it had no jurisdiction. The Act of April 8, 1872, in regard to elections (Rev. Stat. chap. 46), after providing proper tribunals before which contests may be had of the election of governor and other state officers, members of the Senate and House of Representatives, judges of the several courts, and some other officers, provides, in section 96, as follows: "The county court shall hear and determine contests of election of all other county, township and precinct officers, and all other officers for the contesting of whose election no provision is made." It is claimed that by the canon of construction usually indicated by the phrase ejusdem generis, the words "all other officers," as used in said section, must be limited to other officers of the same grade or class as those specifically mentioned, and that such construction necessarily excludes the officers of school districts. It certainly cannot be held that all officers who are not county, township or precinct officers are excluded, because that construction would render the words "and all other officers for the contesting of whose election no provision is made" wholly meaningless, and of no effect. The contesting of the election of all county, township and precinct officers is already provided for; and the last-mentioned clause, therefore, unless it is held to embrace officers who are not county, township or precinct officers, is wholly without force or meaning. By application of the maxim ejusdem generis, which is only an illustration or specific application of the broader maxim, nos citur a sociis, general and specific words which are capable of an analogous meaning, being associated together, take color from each other, so that the general words are restricted to a sense analogous to the less general. Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 400.

But it has never been supposed that the rule required the rejection of the general terms entirely, but only that they should be restricted to cases of the same kind as those expressly enumerated. State v. Williams, 2 Sibbh. L. 474.

On the contrary, it must yield to another salutary rule of construction, viz., that every part of a statute should, if possible, be upheld and given its appropriate force. The cases to be found in the reports in which the rule under consideration has been applied are numerous, but the following will be sufficient for purposes of illustration:

In Renick v. Boyd, 99 Pa. 555, a statute giving a remedy by replevin to recover timber, lumber, coal or other property severed from 12 L. R. A.

the realty, was held to include articles of the same generic character as those already mentioned, such as slate, marble, iron ore, zinc ore and all other forms of minerals and ores, building stone, fixtures and machinery of every description which had been permanently affixed to the realty; but that it did not apply to growing crops. The generic or family characteristic by reason of which these several species of property were held to be included within the same genus as those specifically enumerated was that of being permanently affixed to the freehold, while growing crops were only ephemeral, and never intended to become permanently affixed, but to be removed from the freehold at maturity.

In Reg. v. Dickenson, 7 El. & Bl. 831, a municipal by-law, which imposed a penalty for causing obstructions in the streets in various specified ways, all temporary in their character, and for causing or committing "any other obstruction, nuisance or annoyance" in any of the streets, was held not to include, under the general words, a permanent obstruction, the general characteristic by which the class of nuisances embraced within the general words was distinguished being that which was common to those specially mentioned, viz., their being merely temporary.

In Wanstead Local Board v. Hill, 18 C. B. N. S. 479, a statute prohibiting the establishment without license of the business of a bone-boiler, blood-boiler, fell-monger, slaughterer of cattle, horses or animals of any description, soap-boiler, tallow-melter, tripe-boiler or other noxious or offensive business, trade or manufacture, was held not to include, under the final general terms, any employment not connected, as all the specified trades were, with animal matter, and so did not include the business of brick-making.

In Re Suigert, 119 Ill. 83, 6 West. Rep. 725, the question was whether a certain grain elevator belonging to the Illinois Central Railroad Company was exempt from taxation under the provisions of the charter of said company. The case, therefore, was one calling for a strict rule of construction. In determining whether the grain elevator came within the classes of property exempted from taxation, construction was given to the first section of the company's charter, which gave the company power "to purchase, hold and use all such real estate and other property as may be necessary for the construction of its railway and stations and other accommodations as may be necessary to accomplish the objects of its incorporation;" and it was held to be the well-settled doctrine that, in construing statutes, particularly those requiring a strict construction, a general description, following a specific enumeration of objects or things, will be held to include only such things or objects as are of the same kind as those specifically enumerated. In applying that principle to the section above quoted, it was held that said section did not include a grain elevator, as that had no direct connection with the railway or its operation; yet, without attempting to state the various "other accommodations" which may be held to be ejusdem generis with the company's "railway and stations," it was said that such general description would clearly include the road, with all necessary switches and turn-outs, together with all structures thereon; also rolling stock, with all its machinery and appendages, warehouses and other structures at the terminus or along the line of the road, belonging to the company, and used by it exclusively for the reception of passengers, the storage of freight, and also for the purpose of keeping the road and rolling stock in repair, or of improving their general condition, including all necessary depot grounds and buildings, machine and work shops of all kinds, machinery, tools and implements of every description used in keeping the road and rolling stock in repair and in good and safe condition, together with whatever would be necessary to increase the capacity of the road, such as laying down an additional track, or increasing the amount of rolling stock. All these were said to be included, upon the principle that they had an immediate connection with the improvement and operation of the road. Without adopting what is said in the case last cited as being in all respects a proper exposition of the clause of said charter here under consideration, that one, as well as the other above referred to, may be a test as fairly illustrative of the rule for the construction of the Statute here under discussion.

In construing the Statute before us in the present case we have to determine whether the officers of counties, townships and precincts belong to a genus or class which also includes the officers of school districts. Counties, townships and precincts have one quality or characteristic in common, and one only, viz., they are all quasi municipal corporations; and this quality or characteristic they also hold in common with school districts. There is no legal classification which will include the first three which will not also include the last. As the corporations themselves all belong to the same class, there is no reason for holding that the officers of the three species of quasi municipal corporations particularly mentioned are not eiusdem generis with the officers of school districts, which are only another species of the same class of corporations. It would seem clear, then, that, under any reasonable application of the canon of construction we are now considering the officers of the latter class of corporations should be held to be included in the general description, "all other officers," that is, "all other like officers," for the contesting of whose election no provision is made. What we here say is intended in no way to conflict with the rule laid down in Brush v. Lemma, 77 Ill. 496. In that case the same section of the Statute in relation to elections was under consideration, and it was held that no jurisdiction was thereby conferred upon the county court of a proceeding to contest the election of the mayor of a city incorporated under a special charter. A city is a municipal corporation, properly so called, and is therefore a corporation of an entirely different class, organized for different purposes, and possessing powers and subject to liabilities essentially different from those which obtain in case of counties, townships, school districts and other quasi municipal corporations. It would therefore be much more difficult to hold that cities are corporations eiusdem generis with counties, townships and precincts than to give school districts that classification. We would be understood as expressing no opinion as to the soundness of the conclusion reached in the case last cited, but only desire to say that it does not apply to the facts now before us. But there is another ground upon which the jurisdiction of the county court in this case may be sustained. Section 12 of article 8 of the "Act to Establish and Maintain a System of Free Schools," approved and in force May 21, 1889 (Rev. Stat. 1889, chap. 122), provides for the qualifications of voters "at any school election held under this Act;" and section 13 provides that "the time and manner of opening, conducting and closing said election, and the several liabilities appertaining to the judges and clerks and to the voters, separately and collectively, and the manner of contesting said election, shall be the same as prescribed by the general Election Laws of this State defining the manner of electing magistrates and constables, so far as applicable, subject to the provisions of this Act." While these provisions occur in the article more especially relating to school townships, and the election, qualifications and duties of township trustees, they are plainly intended to apply to all elections held under said Act, except so far as modified by subsequent provisions establishing different rules. Such is the obvious import of the language used, and this view is corroborated by the further fact that, while in subsequent articles provision is made for the election of school directors and boards of education, nothing appears in those articles in relation to the qualifications of voters, the liabilities of judges, clerks or voters, or the mode of contesting elections; nor any special rules in relation to the mode of conducting elections, except as to the mere matter of calling and giving notice, the selection of judges and clerks, adjournments under specified circumstances, and one or two others of minor importance. The general rules governing all elections under said Act having been once laid down in said section 13, it was doubtless deemed unnecessary to repeat them in making provision for the election of directors and boards of education. Magistrates and constables are officers of townships, at least in counties under township organization; and the School Law, having provided that school elections may be contested in the same manner as is provided by the general Election Law in case of the election of those officers, viz., before the county court, clearly vested that court with jurisdiction of proceedings to contest school elections. It follows from what we have said that the county court erred in entering a judgment dismissing the proceeding for want of jurisdiction.

The material facts alleged in the petition are admitted by the answer; and, said court having in its final order found that such was the case, its order is tantamount to a finding that the facts are as alleged in the petition, and admitted by the answer. The facts being found, and no dispute arising in respect to them, the legal conclusion or judgment which should follow becomes a question of law. The errors committed by the county court, and which are open here for review, consist: first, in entering the judgment which was entered; and, second, in refusing to enter the judgment which is the proper legal conclusion from the admitted facts. We may therefore determine upon this appeal what the judgment of the county court should have been. The admissions of the answer lead to the inevitable conclusion that, if the votes for Misch for the office of president of said board of education, evidenced by the ballots which also contained a vote for him for the office of member of said board, were counted in his favor, he would have received a majority of the votes cast, and would have been elected to the office of president of said board. The only question is whether the judges of election properly refused to count those votes in his favor. The theory upon which their rejection was based, as the answer alleges, was that the two offices, viz., president and member of the board of education, were incompatible, and could not therefore be both held by the same person at the same time, and that, as said judges had no power to determine for which of the two offices the voters casting said ballots intended to vote for him, said votes could not properly be counted for either office, and were accordingly rejected altogether. We know of no rule of law which prohibits a man's becoming a candidate or being voted for at the same election for two incompatible offices; but, undoubtedly, if he should be elected to both, he would be incapable of discharging the duties of both offices, and would be compelled to elect which to accept. If, for example, a man should be voted for at the same election for county judge and sheriff, no one, we presume, would insist that the votes cast for him by one portion of the voters for one office would be invalid because another portion of the voters saw fit to vote for him for the other. If, then, different voters may vote for him at the same election for different and incompatible offices, we see no reason why a particular voter, if he chooses so to do, may not vote for him for both offices at the same time. Such manner of voting creates no uncertainty or ambiguity in his ballot, the intention to vote in that way being capable of just as clear and certain an expression as would be an intention to vote for different candidates for the two offices. The judges of election in this case were mistaken in supposing that there was any uncertainty or ambiguity in the ballots in question which needed explanation. The intention of the voters clearly appeared to vote for Misch, both for president and member of the board of education; and the fact that they saw fit to vote for him for the latter office furnished said judges no excuse for refusing to record in his favor their vote for him for the former. Their intention to vote for him for president of said board appeared clearly and unmistakably upon the face of the ballots, and said votes should have been counted for him for that office. Section 58 of the Statute in relation to elections provides that, if more persons are designated upon a ballot for any office than there are candidates to be elected, such part of the ballot shall not be counted for either candidate. This statutory provision is founded upon the obvious reason that the insertion in a ballot of more names than there are candidates to be elected creates an uncertainty or ambiguity, which renders it impossible for the judges of election to select the candidates according to the intention of the voters.

In State v. Tierney, 38 Wis. 480, three persons were voted for for the office of justice of the peace where but two were to be elected; and the court, in holding such ballots void, says: "Three persons are voted for by each voter, when only two can be elected. What is the choice of the elector in such a case? It is manifestly impossible to tell. The insertion upon the ballot of a single name more than ought to be upon it renders it as absolutely uncertain as though a half a dozen or a dozen were inserted. The result is that such a ballot is void for uncertainty. It fails to express the choice of the elector, and consequently cannot be counted as a vote." See also People v. Loomis, 8 Wend. 396; Re School Directors of Wilkesbarre Twp. 6 Phila. 437; State v. Griffey, 5 Neb. 161.

But it has been held that where a ballot contains the name of the person voted for and the office for which he is designated several times repeated, it is not for that reason void, but is to be counted as one ballot. People v. Holden, 28 Cal. 124; Ashfield's Case, Cush. Elect. Cas. 583.

The ballots under consideration in this case, however, do not come within the letter or intention of the section of the Election Law last above quoted. They contain only the proper number of names of candidates for the respective offices, and there is no uncertainty as to the choice of the voters casting said ballots.

The judgment of the County Court will be reversed, and the cause will be remanded to that court, with directions to enter a judgment finding and declaring that at the school election in question said William Misch received a majority of the votes cast for the office of president of said board of education, and was duly elected to that office, and awarding him a certificate of said election.

Magruder, J., concurring specially:

I concur in the conclusion reached by this opinion, but not in all that is said in it. The opinion designates counties as quasi municipal corporations, whereas they have been held to be municipal corporations in at least two cases: Wulff v. Aldrich, 124 Ill. 591, 14 West. Rep. 545; Jimison v. Adams County, 130 Ill. 558. What is said about Brush v. Lemma, 77 Ill. 496, does not harmonize with the views of that case as expressed in Rock Island v. Cuisinly, 126 Ill. 408, and Greenwood v. Murphy, 181 Ill. 604. The mere purposes of illustration would not seem to require that, in a case involving the question of the power of the county court to entertain jurisdiction of or control over the election of a school director, there should be inserted a long statement of what kind of property the Illinois Central Railroad Company may hold for the operation of its road.

Seats inside the car are not the only place where the managers expect passengers to remain; but it is notorious that passengers stand inside the car until the car is full, then upon the platforms until they are full, and even after there is no place to stand except on the steps of the platforms. Meesel v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 8 Allen, 234.

Messrs. Sidney T. Miller and Brennan & Donnelly for appellee.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff was injured while riding upon one of the defendant's cars, under the following circumstances: On September 17, 1890, in the evening, plaintiff, with his wife and children and some friends, had returned by boat from the exposition grounds, landing at the foot of Woodward Avenue. A street-car was standing there, and many passengers from the boat rushed for the car. Plaintiff and his party went to the front of the car. He entered with the ladies and children of his party, while his friend, Mr. Metcalf, remained upon the front platform. Some of them secured seats, and the others stood up. After providing for them as well as he could, he returned to the front platform. The car was drawn by horses. Shortly after the car started it struck a switch, and plaintiff, who was standing with his back against the door, was thrown to the pavement and severely injured. Plaintiff brought this suit to recover damages, alleging that the defendant was guilty of negligence in that it drove and propelled the car, without any notice or warning to plaintiff, against and around said switch. Upon the conclusion of the testimony defendant's counsel requested the court to instruct the jury that there could be no recovery by plaintiff. This the court declined to do, but said the cause "would be submitted to the jury with the instruction that, if plaintiff could have remained in the car, he could not recover; but if it was so full that he could not get a place to go to in the car, then he could re-

When a street-railway company undertakes to carry large numbers of people, vastly in excess of the seating capacity of its cars, and permits passengers to ride on the platforms and footboards without objection, and runs its cars so near the intersection of a switch with the main track that they cannot pass without injury to passengers, the company is guilty of gross negligence. Topeka City R. Co. v. Higgs, 38 Kan. 375.

Contributory negligence defeats recovery.

One who voluntarily stands on the front platform of a street-car, contrary to the regulations of the carrier, is guilty of contributory negligence, which is not excused by a bare license or express permission of the conductor, if there was ample room for him inside the car. Baltimore & Y. Turnp. Road v. Cason, 72 Md. 377.

Where plaintiff occupied a sitting position upon the front platform of a car while in motion, against the rules of the company and the warning of the driver, and without any reasonable excuse therefor, he cannot recover. Lapointe v. Middlesex R. Co. 3 New Eng. Rep. 666, 144 Mass. 18; Wills v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 129 Mass. 351.

It is not enough for the conductor of a street-railway car to warn a child not to ride on the platform; and the company must employ more efficient means to remove him from danger. Indianapolis, P. & C. R. Co. v. Pitzer, 7 West. Rep. 403, 109 Ind. 179; East Saginaw C. R. Co. v. Bohn, 27 Mich. 503.

cover; and if there were room enough for him to remain in the car, when he went in, it was his duty to remain." After the judge had announced his conclusion upon the law, neither of the counsel desired to make any argument to the jury. The court thereupon instructed the jury, and in closing said to them: "The question for you to decide is simply this: When he went into the car, could he have remained in there? that is to say, Was there room enough for him to remain there without going outside? If there were room enough to remain there, and he went outside voluntarily, then he cannot recover. If you should find that there was not room enough to remain there; that the car was full; that he could not stay there; that he was obliged to stand outside to get carriage,—then, gentlemen, you are to consider the damages he has suffered, and award him damages for loss of services, physician's bill and for the injury that has befallen him." Under these instructions, the jury found a verdict of no cause of action.

The question of fact submitted to the jury has been by them decided against the plaintiff. The jury could not well have found otherwise, for the plaintiff's own witnesses testified that there was plenty of standing room inside. Mrs. Metcalf testified that "there was no difficulty about persons standing up inside the car, if they desired to; that there was room enough, if they preferred to stand inside to outside." Miss Mary Metcalf testified that there was plenty of standing room inside when plaintiff went out. The car was supplied with straps for passengers to take hold of when compelled to stand up. We must therefore determine the defendant's liability upon the fact found by the jury that plaintiff voluntarily left the car when there was room for him to ride within it, and voluntarily stood upon the platform.

Is the Company liable under such circumstances for negligently driving its car? Defendant's counsel assert that plaintiff left a place of safety inside the car, and voluntarily chose one of danger upon the platform, and that, as his injury was due in part to the fact that he voluntarily took that position, he cannot recover; and that he took an unnecessary risk is evidenced by the fact that no one who was standing within the car was injured. They also assert that the law recognizes but two excuses for leaving a place of safety for one of danger: (1) where a party, whether erroneously or not, acted under the reasonable impulse of fear produced by another; and (2) where one has tried to save human life, when such effort did not amount to rashness,—neither of which the plaintiff can of course make. The answer to the question depends entirely, we think, upon whether or not it is negligence per se to ride upon the platform of a street-car when one may ride within. Whether one leaves the car, after entering, to ride upon the platform, or whether he steps upon the platform without entering, is of no consequence. His act is as voluntary in the one case as in the other, and the same rule must govern both. The record is entirely silent as to any regulations on the part of the defendant in this respect. But we cannot denude ourselves of the knowledge, which is alike common to all, that passengers are constantly riding upon these platforms with the tacit assent of the defendant, and without any protest, notice or regulation. We must therefore determine the question with the fact before us that this use of the platforms is permitted by the defendant without objection. It is recognized as dangerous per se to ride upon the platform of the ordinary steam railway. This is apparent to anyone, and the difference in danger between riding there and upon the platform of the street-car is too obvious to require comment. Authorities discussing the question afford no light in the determination of this. In the presence of the fact that passengers are permitted to ride upon these platforms constantly, can courts hold them to be dangerous per se? If the railway companies considered them dangerous places, would they not take some means to notify passengers not to ride there, or to inform them that they did so at their own risk? It is certainly reasonable to presume that they would. That they do not consider them dangerous is further apparent from the fact that, when their cars are full, they stop them to take on more passengers, and thus invite them to ride upon the platforms. This appears to be their constant custom. It is evident that the public do not consider these platforms places of danger from the fact of their constant use. It is therefore difficult to see upon what reasons courts can hold that they are dangerous, and that persons who ride there assume all the risk, and thereby relieve such companies from all liability except for gross, willful and wanton misconduct. Under the facts shown by this record, the question of the negligence of the plaintiff, as well as of the defendant, belonged to the jury to determine, and should have been submitted to them under the proper instructions. Such, in my judgment, is the rule established by the clear weight of authority. Nolan v. Brooklyn City & N. E. Co. 87 N. Y. 63; Maguire v. Middlesex R. Co. 115 Mass. 289; German-town Pass. R. Co. v. Walling, 97 Pa. 55; Moose v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 8 Allen, 284; Burns v. Bellefontaine R. Co. 50 Mo. 189; Augusta & S. R. Co. v. Rens, 55 Ga. 126; Seigel v. Eisen, 41 Cal. 109.

This is not in conflict with the case of Downey v. Hendrie, 46 Mich. 496, where the plaintiff went through the car to the front platform and sat on the driving-bar, a thin iron rail not exceeding an inch in thickness, from which he fell under the car. We have no doubt of the correctness of that decision. It is within the power of street-railway companies to prohibit passengers from riding upon the platforms, or to give notice that those who ride there must do so at their own risk, or to limit the number of passengers which each car shall carry, and to require them to ride inside the cars. Until they adopt some such regulations, and notify the public, it is but reasonable to hold them liable for injuries, resulting from their own negligent acts, to their patrons, who are themselves in the exercise of reasonable care, whether riding upon the platforms or within the cars.

1. Collateral security given by the maker of a note "for the payment of this note or any of my liabilities . . . due or to become due," gives an indorser of such note no right to a preference in the application of the proceeds of such security to such note as against other notes not indorsed by him.

2. The rights of an indorser as to the application of collateral security given by the maker to the holder of the note are to be determined by the terms of the pledge as they exist at the time of the sale of the security, and are not affected by pledges formerly made to secure different notes in a series of renewals of which the present note is the last.

REPORT by the Superior Court for Bristol County (Mason, J.) for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of an action brought to determine for which of two sums defendant was liable under his indorsements of notes made by William L. Slade. Judgment for the larger sum.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Jennings & Brayton, for plaintiff:

In case of a general pledge without directions as to application the holder has the right to apply the proceeds in such a manner as will be most advantageous to himself; and the maker or surety has no right to direct as to the order or amount of application to any particular debt or debts.

A fortiori, neither maker nor surety has the right to direct the application of collateral, when they have expressly agreed that it is pledged for the payment of any of William L. Slade's liabilities to the Bank, and expressly directed and agreed at the time of making the pledge that the security may be applied in payment of any of such liabilities. The collateral is not held to secure payment for the note in which it is named any more specifically than it is to secure payment of any other liability.

Mr. James F. Jackson, for defendant:

NOTE.—Right of surety to control application of collaterals.

As between debtor and creditor, the rule as to application of payments is that if several debts are due at the time of a partial payment the debtor is at liberty to apply the payment to whichever debt he pleases, if his intention is manifested at the time of the payment, subject to the restriction that the creditor is not obliged to receive a partial payment of any particular debt of which the whole is due at the time the offer of payment is made. Where the debtor neglects to manifest his intention as to the application of the payment at the time it is made the creditor may, at the time he receives the money, apply it to which debt he pleases, unless the debtor objects at the time. *Stone v. The creditor may apply payments to debts which are not secured by liens in preference to those which are thus secured. Lester v. Houston, 101 N. C. 605; North v. La Flech, 73 Wis. 520.

The mere fact that there is a surety for one of the debts does not preclude the creditor from applying a payment to the debts for which he has no security. Harding v. Tift, 75 N. Y. 464.

Sureties are bound by any application which is legally made by a party having the right to make it. Allen v. Culver, 8 Denio, 201.

The surety has no right to give any direction as to the application of payments by the creditor. Richardson v. Washington Bank, 8 Met. 541.

Mr. Colebrooke, in his work on Collateral Securities, § 219, states the rights of the creditor as against the surety in regard to the application of collaterals as they would be if deduced from the above authorities; and although the authorities cited by him are not cases of attempts to control the application of collateral securities by sureties but in the main cases of application of payments, yet no reason is apparent for a distinction in the rules applicable in the two cases. The rule seems to be similar in the two cases so far as the rights of the debtor and creditor are concerned; for if property is assigned as collateral security for several debts without direction at that time by the assignor as to the application of its proceeds, the creditor may apply the money realized to any of the debts that are due at the time the money is received. National Bank of Newburgh v. Bigler, 88 N. Y. 64. See also Nichols v. Knowles, 8 McCrary, 477.

It has been held that a surety on one or more of a series of promissory notes given for the purchase price of a machine cannot, on a sale of the machine under a mortgage given to secure all the notes, have the proceeds applied on the notes on which he is surety, but the holder may apply them on the notes not otherwise secured. Hanson v. Manley, 72 Iowa, 48.

The creditor may apply the proceeds of collaterals upon his unsecured debt in the absence of direction by either the principal or surety. Wood v. Callaghan, 61 Mich. 412. See also Wilson v. Allen, 11 Or. 154.

The Pennsylvania rule is rather more favorable to the surety, since it holds that although he cannot require a general payment to be applied to a later debt on which alone he is liable to the exclusion of earlier ones, yet he can require that the payment shall not be applied on the last item, leaving him liable on earlier ones. Pardee v. Markie, 2 Cent. Rep. 327, 111 Pa. 548.

Devens, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In December, 1888, when William L. Slade failed, the plaintiff held four notes signed by Slade as maker for the sums of $19,500, $10,000, $7,000 and $1,000, respectively, which were renewals of notes given originally for money loaned to him by the plaintiff. All these notes, except the one for $10,000, were indorsed by the defendant, waiving presentment, demand and notice, and had long been overdue. The plaintiff held certain stocks as collateral security for the liabilities of William L. Slade, and having sold certain shares of a stock known as the Stafford Mills stock for the sum of $23,600, applied the money received therefor to the full payment of the note of $19,500, on which there was then due $18,900 as principal and $204.75 as interest, and applied to the payment of the $10,000 note in addition to the value of certain other stocks which it deemed applicable to that note the sum of $3,576.87, and further applied on the note for $1,000 the balance which was left after payment of the $10,000, note in the manner stated. To the application made on the note of $1,000 of the part of the amount of the $23,600 left after payment of the $10,000 note, the defendant makes no objection, but he contends that the plaintiff had no right to apply on the $10,000 note the balance of the sum derived from the sale of the Stafford Mills stock, and that he had a right to have this sum applied on the $7,000 note, upon which he was indorser. As the defendant is in any event indebted still to the plaintiff, it is agreed that if the plaintiff had the right to apply the proceeds of the Stafford Mills stock after satisfying the $19,500 note to the $10,000 note, judgment shall be rendered for the plaintiff in the sum of $8,384.80 with interest from the date of the writ, but if the defendant is entitled to have the proceeds of the Stafford Mills stock after satisfying the $19,500 note and the note for $1,000 applied next on the $7,000 note rather than that on the $10,000 note, then judgment is to be rendered for the plaintiff in the sum of $3,866.87 with interest from the date of the writ.

The defendant introduced, under exception, evidence of certain facts showing the previous transactions of the parties, which he claimed should be considered in construing the notes as they existed at the time of the failure and assignment of W. L. Slade. It will be more convenient, first, to consider the case without reference to this evidence.

The $19,500 note was dated January 1, 1885, and to the promise to pay is added: "I, having deposited with the Fall River Natl. Bank as collateral security for the payment of this or of any of my liabilities to said Bank due or to become due, now or hereafter, contracted or incurred, two hundred shares of the capital stock of the Stafford Mills of Fall River, hereby authorize said Bank to sell the same either at public or private sale at the option of said Bank on the nonpayment of this note or any other liabilities above mentioned." It is then added that the Bank is to give the promisor credit for any balance deducting expenses, etc., and there is a memorandum on the note that it is a renewal of note for $19,500, dated July 10, 1878.

The note for $7,000 is dated January 10, 1885, and after the promise to pay is added: "I having deposited with the Fall River National Bank, as collateral security, for the payment of this note, or any of my liabilities to said Bank, due, or to become due, now or hereafter contracted or incurred, one hundred twenty-five shares of the capital stock of the Slade Mills, pledge dated November 23, 1880, and two hundred shares of the capital stock of the Stafford Mills, pledge dated July 10, 1878, hereby authorize said Bank to sell the same without notice, either at public or private sale, at the option of said Bank, on the nonpayment of this note or any other of the liabilities above mentioned, the said Bank giving me credit for any balance of the net proceeds of such sale or sales, after deducting the expenses thereof and interest, and all sums for which I may be liable to said Bank, together with all costs, charges and damages to said Bank to enforce this pledge."

The note for $10,000 is dated February 28, 1885, and after the promise to pay is added: "I having deposited with the Fall River National Bank as collateral security for the payment of this note or any of my liabilities to said Bank, due, or to become due, now or hereafter contracted or incurred, one hundred twenty-five shares of the capital stock of the Slade Mills, hereby authorize said Bank to sell the same without notice, either at public or private sale, at the option of said Bank, on the nonpayment of this note or any other of the liabilities above mentioned, the said Bank giving me credit for any balance of the net proceeds of such sale or sales, after deducting the expenses thereof and interest, and all sums for which I may be liable to said Bank, together with all costs, charges and damages to said Bank, to enforce this pledge."

It is claimed by the defendant that this presents the case of a special pledge of the Stafford Mills stock upon the $19,500 note, with a general pledge of the same security for any subsequent indebtedness, that then follows next in the order of time, a special pledge of the same stock upon the note for $7,000, and that therefore the plaintiff could only apply the proceeds of the sale of the Stafford Mills stock to the payment of the $10,000 note, which was subsequent in date after satisfying these two notes. Where stock is specially pledged for the payment of a particular debt, the application of the proceeds would certainly be taken out of the rule which permits a holder of collateral security for several debts due to him to apply the proceeds as he may deem most for his own interest. Wilcox v. Fairhaven Bank, 7 Allen, 270.

Nor do we doubt that a special pledge may be made subject to a previous special pledge which would entitle the pledgor or his surety to have an application of the proceeds made upon the debt for which it was thus specially pledged a second time, in preference to other debts then existing or subsequently incurred. Neponset Bank v. Leland, 5 Met. 259; Hathaway v. Fall River Nat. Bank, 181 Mass. 14.

The question is therefore presented whether there was any special pledge of the Stafford Mills stock for the payment of either the $19,500 note or subject thereto to the payment of the $7,000 note. This stock was deposited with the $19,500 note as collateral security, not for the payment of that note only or of that note in preference to any other. The pledge was for the payment of that note or of any liabilities then due or thereafter becoming due from the principal debtor. It was to be sold, not on nonpayment of the note alone, but on nonpayment of any other of his liabilities either then or thereafter becoming due, and the proceeds could be applied to the payment of them or either of them. The debtor was to have credit for the balance of the proceeds only, after payment of all expenses of the sale and of all sums due the Bank. While the individual note of $19,500 is mentioned, there is no suggestion that it is to receive any preference in the payment. Indeed, by the failure of the debtor to meet other liabilities the collateral security might be sold and applied long before the $19,500 note became due. The same reasoning applies to the second pledge of the same stock upon the $7,000 note. Neither of them constitutes special pledges, so that when the plaintiff lawfully sells the collateral security he is compelled to apply the proceeds on these notes, rather than on the other liabilities of William L. Slade. The form of the pledge of the Stafford Mills stock set forth in these notes strongly resembles that considered in the case of Richardson v. Washington Bank, 8 Met. 586; indeed we do not see that it can be distinguished therefrom. The language in that case after the description of the notes pledged as collateral was: "That for the punctual payment of this or any other sum which I have obtained or may hereafter obtain on loan or discount from said bank, these notes are hereby pledged and made liable, and the directors of said bank are hereby authorized, after said loan or loans have become due and payable, and shall thereafter remain unpaid, to sell the said notes," etc. It was there held that the defendants were under no obligation upon the party holding the security, first to apply it to the payment of the loan obtained when the security was given; that the language of the contract could not be construed as giving a preference or priority to any particular debt, and that the creditor had a right to apply the proceeds of the security as he saw fit. Where collateral security is equally given for various debts, if there is one or more of the debts thus secured for which the debtor alone is responsible, and the amount of which cannot be obtained from him on account of his pecuniary inability, the proceeds may be applied, so far as is necessary for that purpose, to the payment and discharge of such debts, and to that extent the sureties or indorsers on notes constituting other debts have no interest or rights in them. Wilcox v. Fairhaven Bank, 7 Allen, 270.

The defendant was allowed to introduce evidence of the various forms which the notes in question had assumed in the course of the transactions between the parties. It appeared that the $19,500 was the last renewal of a note of July 10, 1878, which earlier note after the promise to pay was in the following form: "I have deposited herewith as collateral security hereto two hundred shares of the capital stock of the Stafford Mills, with full authority to sell the same without notice, either at public or private sale, or otherwise, at the option of the holder or holders hereof, on the nonperformance of this promise, he or they giving me credit for any balance of the net proceeds of such sale or sales, after deducting the expenses thereof, and paying all sums then due from me to said holder or holders, or his or their order, which collateral is to be returned to me on the payment of this note."

The original note of $10,000 was dated November 10, 1880, the Slade Mills stock being named therein as collateral security, while the note of $7,000 was of the date of January 6, 1881, no collateral security being named therein or given for the payment thereof. The original notes of $19,500 and $10,000 were renewed from time to time in the form in which they were originally made, but in December, 1881, the forms of these renewals were changed to the form appearing in the last renewals of 1885 as cited above. At the first renewal of the $7,000 note in May, 1881, and in all subsequent renewals the Slade and Stafford Mills stock were named as collateral. In what language they were thus named does not appear, as the form of the first renewal is not given in the report, but the form appearing in the last renewal was adopted in January, 1882. When the notes under discussion, together with the terms of the pledge, assumed the form which they now have in December, 1881, and January, 1882, substantially contemporaneously and so continued through repeated renewals during a series of years, and when their present form is one entirely intelligible, no profitable inference as to their construction can be drawn from the form which they had either originally or in previous years.

Even if in May, 1881, when the $7,000 note was first renewed, a change was made in the contracts of pledge by which the defendant had more rights in regard to the application of the collateral security to the payment of the notes upon which he was surety, there is no reason why the parties interested might not in December, 1881, and January, 1882, so subsequently change their contracts as to give the plaintiff more rights in the application of the collateral security than he had in May, 1881. The form by which the note of $7,000 was first renewed is not before us, but the defendant's right as the notes were originally made and in the shape they finally assumed in the construction we have given to the contract by which the collateral security was pledged gave him no right that the $7,000 should be preferred in payment to the $10,000 note. If there was a time in the history of the transactions when this preference existed, which is not shown by the evidence reported, the defendant could not single that out and demand that his rights should be tested as of that time rather than as they existed when the collateral security was sold and the proceeds applied by the plaintiff.

While it has been held that the renewal or extension by note or otherwise of an original debt secured by collateral security does not without express agreement extinguish the original debt or security, as it cannot be inferred that the holder intended to surrender to his own detriment rights which are established, yet this principle has no application to those cases where in the renewal the collateral security is mentioned and new or different terms are provided upon which it is to be held.

The defendant was allowed to put in a statement marked "H," but we do not understand from this that it appears that the plaintiff made any different application of the surplus after sale of the Stafford Mills from that which it claimed the right to make.

In the view we have taken of the case the evidence as to the previous transactions of the parties and the previous forms of their notes and the provisions for the collateral security thereof was not important, even if admissible.

The rights of the defendant to the application of the collateral security are to be determined by the terms of the pledge as they existed at the time of the sale thereof. According to these the defendant had no right that the proceeds should be applied to the payment of the $7,000 note rather than that of $10,000.

All tribunals must "take care that not only in their decrees they are not influenced by their personal interest, but avoid the appearance of laboring under such an influence."

Cooley, Const. Lim. §§ 410, 411.

The decision of Judge Head, that he was incompetent to proceed further in the cause, after argument and consideration, and which was entered of record, was a judicial act, a judicial determination, the exercise of judicial functions, and cannot be reviewed, set aside and a new and different decision ordered and enforced by mandamus.

The special judge proceeded and the cause was tried,—proceeded regularly, and continuously from beginning to end, without "neglect of any duty" or "refusal to act" by either Judge Head, or Special Judge Thornton. If 12 L. R. A.

during the progress of the trial either judge made an erroneous decision, an appeal was open to remedy the wrong. Mandamus will not lie if there be any other adequate remedy or mode of redress.

McClellan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The disbarment of attorneys is a subject matter of which the circuit courts of this State have jurisdiction. The filing of the accusation shown by the record before us, by and in the name of the Alabama State Bar Association against Peyton G. Bowman, the order thereon made requiring the accused to appear and answer the same, and the service of a copy of said order, together with a copy of the accusation, on said Bowman, gave the Circuit Court of Jefferson County, in which these proceedings were had, jurisdiction of his person, at least in the sense of establishing in some sort a lis pendens between him and the Association. Whether the accusation was sufficient to put into exercise the jurisdiction of the court to the end of finally determining and adjudging between these parties the truth or falsity of its specifications; whether it was bad, in that it was not verified and did not proceed in the name of the State of Alabama, so that a final judgment of guilt and consequent disbarment would be coram non judge and void,—are questions which do not arise on this application for mandamus, and which we do not at all consider. Whatever may be the correct solution of those questions is wholly immaterial to the matter now in hand. In any event, as to them a proceeding was pending in the circuit court at the time the judge of that court refused to act in respect to it. There was then on the files and in the records of that court an action by the Alabama State Bar Association against Bowman, and to the disposition of that action the discharge of judicial functions by the judge was essential. The right of the relator to file the accusation at all was denied, and a question for the determination of the judge was thereby presented. The right of the relator to file an unsworn accusation was denied, and thereupon it devolved on the judge to decide whether verification was necessary. And however infirm the accusation may have been, however lacking in necessary parties or averment, however essential its verification and however incurable by amendment may have been its defects, both the relator and the respondent had a right to demand that it be passed upon by the judge of the court in which it was pending, if he was competent to sit in the case; and without such adjudication by him, assuming his competency, the case could not be gotten rid of. Moreover, the circuit judge, before the objection to his competency was made and sustained, passed upon these questions, and ruled that the accusation was in all respects sufficient to invoke the jurisdiction of the court to a final determination of the issues of fact presented by it; and this adjudication, to the effect that the case was not only actually but properly pending in the court, cannot be expunged, even if it be erroneous, except by or consequent upon further judicial action of Judge Head, if he be competent. So that it is manifest, we think, that in any aspect the issuance of a peremptory mandamus would not be a vain and useless thing to do,—conceding the case to be otherwise a proper one for this remedy,—but would be to require necessary judicial action.

Is mandamus the proper remedy in cases like this? The point appears to be too well settled by the authorities to justify, or even admit, of much discussion. While recourse is never had to this writ to control judicial action, it is the usual, and generally the only adequate, process to compel the discharge of judicial functions. Its mandate is that the judge before whom a cause is pending shall proceed to hear and determine the same, but its use is not warranted to direct what particular judgment shall be rendered therein. High, Extr. Legal Rem. §§ 147, 151; Foreman v. Marianna, 48 Ark. 324; Ex parte Mahone, 80 Ala. 49; Ex parte Schmidt, 63 Ala. 252; State v. Williams, 69 Ala. 311.

The writ is not to be resorted to, of course, when the party invoking it has another adequate remedy. With respect to what is an adequate remedy, within the sense of this rule, the doctrine obtaining in this court is supposed by text-writers to be more favorable to the remedy by mandamus than that which generally prevails. However that may be, it seems assured by the former adjudications of the court that this remedy may be invoked whenever there is wrongful refusal of a judge to act, other remedies for such a wrong, if they exist at all, being considered inadequate to the end in view. In the case at bar, manifestly no appeal would lie from the refusal of the presiding judge to hear and determine the cause; and, conceding that the petitioner had a remedy by appeal from the final judgment rendered in the cause by the special judge, it can scarcely be contended, if the position of petitioner with respect to the competency of the judge of the circuit court be sound, that a remedy which involved a trial with a stranger on the bench, and could only arise upon the rendition of an absolutely void judgment, is one which is adequate to the end of ousting that stranger, and reinstating the de jure judge of the court. So that, premitting the consideration whether a final judgment with the alleged special judge on the bench would support an appeal at all,—conceding, for argument, that it would, though void,—we are of opinion that the remedy by appeal from it is so inadequate as to authorize a resort to this summary proceeding. High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 186, and citations.

The objection urged in argument that the writ should not be awarded in this instance because the circuit judge had judicially determined his own incompetency, and hence that to command him to proceed would be to control his judicial action, is wholly untenable. One of the original offices of the writ was to compel judicial officers who, from whatever cause or upon whatever considerations, wrongfully refused to act, to proceed with, hear and determine the case in hand. Their discretion will not be controlled; and in the decision of every question arising on the trial of a cause, whether of law or fact, with respect to the rights of the parties litigant in the subject matter involved, they, in the sense of this doctrine, have a discretion, the exercise of which will in general be reviewed only on error or appeal, when those remedies are adequate. But it can never rest in the discretion of a judge whether he will sit in a given cause. If he is not disqualified under the Constitution, it is his duty to sit, a duty which he cannot delegate or repudiate, and which no consent can devolve upon another. The inquiry is not what he has determined, but What are the facts in regard to his alleged incompetency? Is he, in point of fact, as shown by his return to the alternative writ, "for any legal cause" incompetent to hear and determine the case presented? It is to be assumed that no refusal to sit proceeds on other than a determination of the judge that he is incompetent to do so; and to hold that mandamus will not lie where there has been such determination would be to destroy the efficacy of this summary remedy as a means of compelling recusant judges to discharge their judicial functions. The doctrine would be especially pernicious in cases like the present one, where recusation is at the objection of a party, and on the ground of interest; since it would be natural for a conscientious and sensitive judge to resolve all doubts on the question against his competency to try the cause.

The sole ground of incompetency disclosed by the return in this case is the membership of Judge Head in the plaintiff corporation, the Alabama State Bar Association, and his consequent interest in the suit, resulting from the liability of that corporation for the costs of the proceedings should its determination be adverse to the Association. This corporation is not a commercial or financial concern. It is not capitalized; its members are not stockholders. Its purposes are social, ethical and public, and not pecuniary or private. Its scheme involves no element of gain or loss pecuniarily to its membership. It is supported by fixed annual dues, exacted from its members, and these would neither be increased nor diminished by any possible result of this litigation. It has authority to acquire and hold property within certain limits of value. Whether it has acquired any property does not appear from the return, and if the respondent seeks any advantage by reason of its ownership of property, his interest in which as a member would be affected by any judgment that might be rendered in this cause, it was upon him to return the fact. But conceding that we must assume that the Association did own property to the limits of its power in that respect, and conceding, further, that the interest of members in that property was such that, upon the dissolution of the corporation, each member would be entitled to a distributive share of it—a proposition unsupported by authority—still this interest would be entirely too remote and speculative to disqualify the member from sitting as judge or juror in a case to which the corporation is a party. The interest which will disqualify must be a pecuniary one, or one affecting the individual rights of the judge. The fact that dues which he pays to the Association may have to be appropriated to the satisfaction of a judgment for costs cannot constitute such interest, since the dues are paid for that purpose, among others, whether in contemplation of such judgment or not, and the amount of his liability in that respect is not affected by the rendition of a judgment for costs against the Association. Moreover, "the liability of pecuniary gain or relief to the judge must occur upon the event of the suit, not result remotely, in the future, from the general operation of law upon the status fixed by the decision." 12 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 45 et seq.

The diminution of a member's distributive share in the corporation property depending upon a dissolution which may never occur, or never during his life or membership, or relief from such result, is certainly entirely too remote to be considered in any sense as occurring "upon the event of the suit." It is, on the contrary, if possible at all, a result of the remote future, "from the general operation of law on the status fixed by the decision." That the interest relied on to disqualify must be a pecuniary one, and be affected by the event of the suit, and not remotely, is fully illustrated in the adjudged cases. Thus it has been frequently held that the interest of a taxpayer and citizen of a town was not such as to disqualify him to sit as a judge or juror in the trial of a cause to which the town was a party. Foreman v. Marianna, 48 Ark. 824; Minneapolis v. Wilkin, 80 Minn. 140; State v. Craig, 80 Me. 85, 6 New Eng. Rep. 160; Re Guerrero, 69 Cal. 88. And the same doctrine applies to the interest a citizen of a county has in the result of a suit to which it is a party (Com. v. Reed, 1 Gray, 472; Clermont County Comrs. v. Lytle, 8 12 L. R. A.

Ohio, 289); and likewise, of course, in respect to state citizenship, and consequent interest in its property. Connecticut v. Bradish, 14 Mass. 296.

And where the salary of a judge is payable out of a fund arising from the imposition of fines, as is the case with the judges of some of the city courts in this State, his interest is too remote to disqualify him to sit in a cause which may involve the imposition of a fine to be thus appropriated. Re Guerrero, 69 Cal. 88. And so, where the question involved is the removal of the county seat of the county of the judge's residence; and this, though he, with other registered voters, had signed a petition addressed to the commissioners' court to that end. Sauls v. Freeman, 28 Fla. 325.

Where the interest relied on to justify a judge in refusing to sit lay in the fact of his honorary membership of a bar association which was prosecuting a proceeding to disbar an attorney, it was held insufficient "since he had not a particle of pecuniary interest involved." Bowman's Case, 87 Mo. 146. Nor does membership of a church which is a party to a suit involve such interest as will disqualify the member to hear and determine the cause as judge or juror. Methodist Episc. Church v. Wood, 5 Ohio, 288. And the same rule prevails with respect to a member of a masonic lodge which is a party to a suit. Burdine v. Grand Lodge of Alabama, 87 Ala. 478.

In all these cases there was either no pecuniary interest at all, because of the character and purpose of the corporation, or the interest was too remote to disqualify. In most of them the interest was more direct than in the case at bar, conceding any pecuniary interest to exist here, and in others there was more ground to predicate the existence of such interest upon than is disclosed in this record. Our conclusion is that the return of Judge Head does not justify his refusal to sit in and hear and determine this cause. The proceedings had therein before the attorney selected by the clerk were coram non iudice and void. The fact of Judge Head's incompetency being non-existent, there was no authority to appoint a special judge, and no acquiescence, submission or consent of parties could confer upon him any power to try the cause or render any judgment in it. Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 504; Hoagland v. Creed, 81 Ill. 596; Andrews v. Beck, 28 Tex. 455; Haverly Invincible Mining Co. v. Horcutt, 6 Colo. 574.

WOODSTOCK IRON CO.

(....Ala....)

1. A letter by the grantee in a deed, soon after coming of age, demanding,

NOTE.—What acts necessary to disaffirm an infant's contract.

Contracts relating to persons or personal property may be disaffirmed by any act which shows an intention not to be bound by them. Skinner v. Maxwell, 66 N. C. 47.

Thus a chattel mortgage may be disaffirmed by without qualification or condition, the repayment of money which he had paid, on the sole ground that he was a minor at the time of the purchase, although claiming that he was morally justified, under the circumstances, in repudiating the trade, is a binding disaffirmance of the purchase.

2. Disaffirmance of a deed by the grantee on coming of age, because of his infancy at the time of the purchase, does not, proprio vigore, divest him of the legal title and reinvest it in the grantor.

3. Disaffirmance of a deed by the grantee on coming of age because of his infancy when it was made is conclusive, and he cannot thereafter affirm it without the other party's consent, although no further action has been taken by either party to restore the other to his original condition by transfer of the title or consideration.

4. A suit to cancel a deed to an infant, after his disaffirmance on coming of age, can be maintained on his subsequently claiming to affirm it, as the disaffirmance did not reinvest the grantor with title.

(November 26, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the City Court of Anniston in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to procure the cancellation of a deed. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Brothers, Willett & Willett, for appellant:

Where an infant after becoming of age repudiates a purchase or sale of lands made during minority, the legal title passes with repudiation, and ejectment for the premises can be successfully maintained or defended upon this repudiation.

Manning v. Johnson, 26 Ala. 446; Sedgw. &

W. Trial of Title, § 198; Voorhies v. Voorhies, 24 Barb. 150; Freeman v. Bradford, 5 Port. (Ala.) 270; Boal v. Mix, 17 Wend. 119, 81 Am. Dec. 285; Sharp v. Robertson, 76 Ala. 343; 8 Wait, Act. and Def. p. 89.

The letter of March 16, 1886, was not in itself sufficient to amount to a repudiation. While it may have expressed an intention to repudiate, still no steps were ever taken to consummate the repudiation. It would take a more solemn act of McCarty to repudiate the deed or sale to him than it would to confirm it.

Messrs. Knox & Bowie and Caldwell & Johnston for appellee.

Clopton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Our decisions, which are in harmony with the later adjudications, have established that a contract of purchase of land entered into by an infant, whether executed or executory, is voidable, subject to confirmation or disaffirmance at his election, on arriving at age. The right of election is personal, and paramount to any equity of the other party; it may be exercised without reference to his assent or dissent. When the infant has exercised the privilege to rescind his contract, he cannot afterwards abandon or repudiate the rescission, and take the other alternative. The disaffirmance renders the contract void ab initio, and restores the rights of the parties to the same condition in which they would have been had no contract been made, though the adult party may, in some cases, and under some circumstances, be remediless. Appellee, the Woodstock Iron an unconditional sale of the mortgaged chattel to a third person (State v. Plaisted, 43 N. H. 414), at least if the chattel has remained in the possession of the mortgagor. Chapin v. Shafer, 49 N. Y. 407.

With reference to contracts relating to real estate the precise acts which will be sufficient to effect a disaffirmance are not fully determined. The earlier cases, especially in the Eastern States, held that to effect a disaffirmance the disaffirming act must be of equal solemnity with the original one. Thus it was held that though an entry may be necessary to avoid a feoffment and livery by an infant, yet it is not necessary to avoid a deed of bargain and sale, but the latter may be avoided by another deed of the same description and of equal notoriety with the original conveyance. Jackson v. Carpenter, 11 Johns. 541; Jackson v. Burchin, 14 Johns. 124.

Those were cases in which the land remained vacant after the conveyance; and in Boal v. Mix, 17 Wend. 123, it was intimated that if the land was held adversely to the infant a second deed would be ineffectual to revoke the first conveyance, and that in such case there should be an entry or some act of equal notoriety, and that such avoidance must precede the bringing of an action to recover possession.

In Voorhies v. Voorhies, 24 Barb. 153, the same doctrine was maintained, though the "act of equal notoriety" was described as "demanding possession or giving notice of intention not to be bound by the first deed."

This doctrine distinguishing between cases in which the land has gone into the possession of the grantees and those where it remains vacant or in the possession of the grantor is found in other 12 L. R. A.

cases. Roberts v. Wiggins, 1 N. H. 73; Harris v. Cannon, 6 Ga. 382.

That the disaffirming act must be one of equal solemnity with the original one found partial support in the United States Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Story stating that there are different ways in which an infant may avoid his acts, yet if the act is by matter of record it must be avoided by act of record, and if the act is matter in pais it may be avoided by act in pais of equal solemnity or notoriety. (Tucker v. Moreland, 85 U. S. 10 Pet. 72, 9 L. ed. 351), although the court stated in that case: "We do not mean to say that the act of disaffirmance should be of the same or of as high and solemn a nature as the original act, but simply that if the act of disaffirmance be of as high and solemn a nature there is no ground to impeach its sufficiency."

Roberts v. Wiggin, 1 N. H. 73, held that if the infant had retained possession of the land his conveyance might be defeated by any act explicitly evincing such intent, such as express and formal notice, etc.

This doctrine has been applied to all cases by later decisions, which hold that the doctrine of equal solemnity was applicable to feoffments only; that entry was not necessary in any case, and that avoidance may be accomplished by entry, suit or action, subsequent conveyance, effort to restore the parties to their original condition, or any act unequivocally manifesting the intention (Cresinger v. Welch, 15 Ohio, 186, citing Drake v. Ramsey, 5 Ohio, 232); by notice of disaffirmance, by suit, plea, or entry upon real estate, or other unmistakable act of dissent (McCarthy v. Nicrosi, 72 Ala. 335); by Company, seeks by the bill the cancellation of a deed, made May 1, 1884, conveying to appellant a lot in the City of Anniston. The cancellation is sought on the ground that the grantee was a minor at the time of its execution, and after arriving at his majority disaffirmed the contract of purchase without reconveying, or offering to reconvey, the property, and retains the deed, denying complainant's right to a conveyance. The answer denies disaffirmance, and sets up confirmation of the contract, of which complainant had notice long before the bill was filed.

The main point of contention involves the construction and effect of a letter, admitted to have been written by defendant to complainant March 16, 1886. The following is a copy: "In the spring of 1884, I purchased from you a lot in the City of Anniston, and paid you three hundred and thirty-four dollars; also gave you two notes, each calling for three hundred and thirty-three dollars, bearing interest from date, one due one year, and the other two years. I do not think that the Woodstock Iron Co. has performed its part in its attitude towards the town, and for this reason I claim from the W. I. Co. three hundred and thirty-four dollars, with interest from date of deed. The Company cannot ignore this claim, because the trade was made before I was of age. I consider myself, under the circumstances, justified in repudiating the trade, and claiming the law on the subject." Defendant contends that the letter is the mere expression of mere intention to repudiate the contract if the demand therein made was not complied with, or a conditional repudiation, and in order to make it complete and effectual should have been followed by suit to recover the money, or by some unequivocal act of equal notoriety and solemnity with the original act. In support of their contention, counsel refer to the case of Irvine v. Irvine, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 617, 19 L. ed. 800. The question under consideration being whether, in order to be sufficient to affirm an infant's deed, the act of affirmance must be of the same solemnity of the deed itself, it was said: "There is a well-recognized distinction between the nature of those acts which are necessary to avoid an infant's deed and the character of those which are sufficient to affirm it; and the act of confirmation, being of a character less solemn than the act of avoidance, may be effected in a less formal manner. The reasons assigned for the distinction are that the deed of an infant, not being void, passes the title to the land to his grantee; and if avoided, the ownership is retransferred, and the seisin changed; while a confirmation passes no title, effects no change of property and disturbs no seisin." The question in that case was whether the infant had affirmed his deed. The nature of the act sufficient to avoid a contract of purchase was not involved. Also, there is a well-recognized distinction between the acts which will avoid an infant's deed in the case of a sale and those which will avoid a contract of purchase, though a deed was made to the infant. Acts which are usually regarded as necessary to avoid an infant's deed—such as entry, selling and conveying to another, and bringing suit to recover possession—would amount to a confirmation in the case of a purchase. Even in respect to the avoidance of deeds made by infants, the current of modern decisions is to a liberal extension of the rule; and the tendency is to establish one simpler, more conservative and of easier and more notice of disaffirmance followed by acts of ownership or such as indicate a claim of ownership as against the deed, such as possession, suit to regain possession, payment of taxes, selling or leasing or improvement of premises. Tunison v. Chamblin, 88 Ill. 378.

So that the modern doctrine, in most of the States at least, seems to be that the act of disaffirmance need not be as solemn as the original act (Allen v. Poole, 54 Miss. 331; and that notice or a subsequent conveyance is sufficient without an entry (Scranton v. Stewart, 52 Ind. 93; Peterson v. Lalk, 24 Mo. 541; Pitcher v. Laycock, 7 Ind. 403; Vallandigham v. Johnson, 85 Ky. 233; Hoyle v. Stowe, 2 Dev. & B. L. 320; M'Gill v. Woodward, 3 Brev. 401; Haynes v. Bennett, 58 Mich. 17; Dixon v. Merritt, 21 Minn. 193; Hastings v. Dollarhide, 24 Cal. 211), though an entry is always safest in those States where land held adversely cannot be conveyed; but even in such cases, Riggs v. Fisk, 64 Ind. 100, held that the second deed is simply ineffectual to put the grantee in possession, and that it constitutes full authority for the grantee to prosecute a suit in the name of the grantor to obtain possession of the premises for the grantee's benefit.

The Missouri court says that the ancient doctrine which required the disaffirming act to be as high and solemn in character as the act disaffirmed has no place in modern law. The disaffirming act need take no particular form or expression, but it must show an unequivocal intent to repudiate. If consistent with the continued existence of the original act there is no disaffirmance. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Lamb, 81 Mo. 225.

Expressions are found to the effect that any act showing an intention to disaffirm is sufficient. Heath v. West, 26 N. H. 190; White v. Flora, 2 Over. (Tenn.) 423.

An action of ejectment preceded by notice of intention to disaffirm is sufficient. Doe v. Abernathy, 7 Blackf. 443.

And in some States the bringing of a suit for possession within proper time is a sufficient disavowal of the deed though there is no disaffirmance or notice of intention to disaffirm; at least such suits seem to pass unchallenged. Birch v. Linton, 73 Va. 584 (citing Bedinger v. Wharton, 37 Gratt. 370; Mustard v. Wohlford's Heirs, 15 Gratt. 329; Harris v. Ross, 85 Mo. 83; Webb v. Hall, 85 Mo. 336; Clark v. Tate, 7 Mont. 171. See also Cole v. Pennoyer, 14 Ill. 158.

But some of the cases hold that disaffirmance is necessary before an action can be brought. Law v. Long, 41 Ind. 599; Haynes v. Bennett, 53 Mich. 71.

There appears to be no need for disaffirmance or notice before bringing suit to set aside a conveyance or have a contract declared void. Gillespie v. Bailey, 13 W. Va. 70; Shaffer v. Lavretta, 57 Ala. 14.

The acts must, of course, be inconsistent or there can be no disaffirmance. Bagley v. Fletcher, 44 Ark. 155; Buchanan v. Griggs, 18 Neb. 121.

So a subsequent deed will avoid a prior one, but a second mortgage will not avoid a prior one. Morgan v. Marshall, 7 Humph. 120.

When ratified cannot be disaffirmed.

If the act has once been ratified it cannot afterwards be disaffirmed. Hastings v. Dollarhide, 24 Cal. 211.

general application, thereby avoiding many of the perplexing and refined distinctions under the strict rule, which required the act of disaffirmance to be of equal notoriety and solemnity with the original act or conveyance, but which was never of universal application, for the deed could always be avoided by a proper plea.

In McCarthy v. Nicotri, 73 Ala. 883, speaking in reference to the avoidance of an infant's deed, or other executed contract, it is said: "The usual rule is that any such contract may be affirmed by unequivocally recognizing its continued existence and binding force. So it may be disavowed by some distinct and positive act, leaving no room for doubt as to the intention of the party. This may be effected by notice of disaffirmance, by suit, plea or entry upon real estate, or other unmistakable act of dissent, or of confirmation, as the case may be." A fortiori a contract of purchase of land may be disaffirmed by the infant after attaining majority by act manifesting distinctly and unequivocally an election and intention to disaffirm, by any act of distinct and positive dissent, whatever may be its form or expression. White v. Flora, 3 Overt. (Tenn.) 426; Drake v. Ramsey, 5 Ohio, 251; Tunison v. Chamblin, 88 Ill. 378; Singer Mfg. Co. v. Lamb, 81 Mo. 221.

This rule is consistent with and conserves the absolute and paramount right of disaffirmance. Recurring to the letter, there seems no room for doubt as to the intention of defendant. It was written a few days after he had arrived at twenty-one years of age; states the precise terms of the contract, so that there could be no mistake; and claims the exact amount of the purchase money paid, with interest from date of deed. The reason assigned, that the Company had not performed its part in its attitude towards the town, is not stated as the legal basis of the claim,—he shows no injury he had sustained by the conduct of the Company or what that conduct was,—but as morally justifying him "in repudiating the trade, and claiming the law on the subject." What law? The law which gave him the right to disaffirm a contract entered into while a minor, which is the only legal ground stated why the Company could not ignore the claim. Claim of repayment of the precise sum paid at the time of the purchase, with interest from the date of the deed, is inconsistent with the recognition of the continued existence of the contract; for without rendering it void by disaffirmance he had no right to claim the return of the money.

But it is said the money was not returned, and no suit was brought for its recovery. As we have stated, the exercise of defendant's right did not depend upon the conduct of the Company. Neither the manner in which the letter was treated nor the failure or refusal to return the money could affect in any way the exercise of defendant's right of election, or avoid the effect of the disaffirmance. A suit to recover the money would itself have been an act of avoidance, but it is not necessary the letter should be followed by such suit to render it effectual as an act of disaffirmance. And, though rescission of the contract restores the rights of the parties to the situation in which they were when the contract was entered into, 13 L. R. A.

an offer to reconvey the lot was not essential to a complete disaffirmance. An infant need not tender anything he may have acquired or received under the contract. He subjects himself to liability to account for what he has received and has in possession when he reached his majority, and may sue for what he has paid. A tender is only material and essential as a condition to the right of either party to sue and recover in equity. Eureka Co. v. Edwards, 71 Ala. 248; Chandler v. Simmons, 97 Mass. 508. The letter, being a demand or claim for the repayment of the money, without qualification or condition, on the sole ground that defendant was a minor at the time of the purchase, must be regarded as a distinct and positive act of dissent, unequivocally manifesting his intention and election to disaffirm the contract.

Another point of contention arises on the ground of demurrer to the bill,—that, conceding an avoidance, complainant's remedy at law is complete and adequate. The position is that on disaffirmance the title to the lot was, ipso facto, retransferred to complainant, and the Company can maintain ejectment to recover possession. Many authorities so hold in respect to the avoidance of an infant's deed; and, as an infant's deed passes the title to his grantee, subject to the right of the grantor to confirm or avoid,—in legal effect a conditional transfer, continuing in force until avoided and defeated by disaffirmance,—it may be that avoidance in such case operates, proprio vigore, to divest the grantee of the title, and reinvest it in the grantor. But the case is different when the deed is made by an adult grantor to an infant under a contract to purchase; such deed is not subject to avoidance by the grantor at his option or election. It has been uniformly held in this State that an estoppel resting in parol, though it may bind the land in equity, does not and cannot affect the legal title in a court of law. McPherson v. Wallers, 16 Ala. 714; Morgan v. Casey, 73 Ala. 222.

It has also been held that the rescission of a contract of purchase, and cancellation or destruction of the deed, by agreement of the parties, will not divest the title out of the grantee and reinvest it in the grantor. Brady v. Huff, 75 Ala. 80. It is true that, when an infant disaffirms his contract of purchase after becoming of age, it ceases to exist for the benefit of either party, and is rendered void ab initio, and the other party is reinvested with a right to whatever he has parted with under the contract, and may sue to reclaim it. But it results from the foregoing well-established principles that when the grantor is capable of passing the title, and the grantee capable of taking, the deed not being subject to avoidance by the grantor, no act in pais will operate to retransfer to him the legal title. The disaffirmance destroyed all defendant's equitable claim or title to the land, but did not affect the legal. Defendant, having once disaffirmed, could not repudiate it, and then confirm; the contract, having been made void, cannot be revived, except by mutual consent. Still, he retains the deed and denies complainant's right to a reconveyance, claiming that he abandoned the idea of disaffirming, and has confirmed the purchase. The real object of the bill is to procure a judicial ascertainment of the rescission of the contract, and the enforcement of the rescission by cancellation of the deed. The bill offers to pay the amount paid by defendant, and to return the purchase-money notes. Its equity rests on the jurisdiction of the court of the rescission of contracts. The bill and proof make a case for relief.

Affirmed.

1. A stipulation, in a promissory note, to pay all costs of collecting if not paid at maturity, does not destroy its negotiability.
2. A material alteration of a promissory note by any of the parties thereto discharges from liability all other parties not consenting to, or authorizing, the alteration, whether it is apparently or presumably to their benefit or detriment.

3. Adding "& Co." to his name by the maker of a note is a material alteration of it, which will release the indorser, if done without his consent or authority.
4. The fact that the addition of "& Co." to the maker's name on a note is ineffectual to bind his partners will not prevent it from being a material alteration as to an indorser.
5. An act which may be authorized or consented to in vitae may be effectually ratified after it has been performed.
6. No new consideration is necessary in order to make valid a ratification of a note by one who was entitled to his release therefrom because of an alteration.
7. The burden of proving that a note was altered after indorsement is upon the indorser, where he relies on that fact as a defense.
8. One who indorsed a note before it was signed, and gave it to the maker to be signed in such a way as to raise money for both of them, is not released as indorser by the fact that the maker changed his signature to that of his firm by adding "& Co.," since, so far as the

Necessity of consideration to validity of ratification of altered note.

As shown in the principal case, an alteration of a negotiable instrument may generally be ratified, and as further shown the conflict seems to arise over the necessity for a consideration to support such ratification. Contributing towards the uncertainty are cases which are at variance as to the—

Ratification of forged instruments.

That a forgery may be ratified has been held in Dow v. Spenny, 29 Mo. 387; Forsyth v. Day, 46 Me. 176; Howard v. Duncan, 3 Lans. 175, citing Union Bank v. Middlebrook, 33 Conn. 90; Greenfield Bank v. Crafts, 4 Allen, 447; Wellington v. Jackson, 121 Mass. 159.

That a forgery cannot be ratified is decided in Brook v. Hook, L. R. 6 Exch. 88; McHugh v. Schuykill Co. 67 Pa. 391; Henry v. Heeb, 14 West. Rep. 84, 114 Ind. 275.

It is also held that the doctrine of ratification is not applicable to a case of forgery, since such doctrine has reference to the acts of an agent while a forger cannot be considered in any sense the agent of the one whose name he forges. Ferry v. Taylor, 38 Mo. 338; Workman v. Wright, 33 Ohio St. 405.

Shisler v. Vandike, 62 Pa. 447, holds that permitting ratification of a forgery would be contrary to public policy.

One whose name has been forged may estop himself from denying the genuineness of the signature. Hefner v. Vandolah, 62 Ill. 468; Woodruff v. Munroe, 33 Md. 155; Crout v. DeWolf, 1 R. I. 398.

The States which do not recognize a possibility to ratify a forgery hold a new contract upon a new consideration necessary, in the absence of estoppel, to raise any liability. McHugh v. Schuykill Co. and Workman v. Wright, supra.

Cases of that class are cited as authority for the necessity of consideration in—

Cases of alteration.

But even those cases hold that where the transaction is contrary only to good faith and fair dealing, where it affects individual interests and nothing else, ratification is allowable. Shisler v. Vandike, supra.

In Connecticut the court early held that the promise of an accommodation indorser, made after his discharge, to pay a note was of no efficacy if without consideration. Huntington v. Harvey, 4 Conn. 123. Most, if not all, of the authorities cited in that case were application of doctrines of the common law, and not of the law merchant.

The case of Wilson v. Hayes (Minn.), 4 L. R. A. 196, cited in the principal case, appears to be the strongest case which holds a consideration necessary. It was a suit between the original parties to the instrument, and the court held that where there was a fraudulent alteration which both destroys the instrument (see note in 4 L. R. A. 196), and extinguishes the debt, subsequent ratification of the alteration given to the party who made it, without any new consideration, is a mere naked promise.

The Kentucky doctrine referred to in the principal case appears to have gone no further than to affirm that if the surety's name is forged to a note, or if he is discharged by a material alteration, since he receives no benefit from the instrument, his promise to pay the debt will be of no avail unless made upon sufficient consideration. Warner v. Fant, 79 Ky. 1; Owsley v. Phillips, 78 Ky. 517.

That court recognizes a distinction in the effect of an alteration upon the liability of the principal debtor and upon that of a surety. Emmons v. Overton, 18 B. Mon. 650.

Most of the cases which have held that an altered or forged instrument could be ratified have contained no intimation that any new consideration was necessary. Goodspeed v. Cutler, 75 Ill. 534; Stewart v. First Nat. Bank of Port Huron, 40 Mich. 343; Greenfield Bank v. Crafts, 4 Allen, 447; Sweetser v. French, 3 Cush. 315; Wellington v. Jackson, 121 Mass. 159.

Prouty v. Wilson, 123 Mass. 297, holds an agreement to forbear, followed by actual forbearance of enforcement of the note when due, is a sufficient consideration. The principal case seems to cite all the cases which are fully in accord with its doctrine on this question. In addition, Cameron v. Grigsby, 3 West. Rep. 87, 116 Ill. 151, held that where the maker of a note given for property knew of alterations in it, and retained the property without rescinding the contract, he would be liable on the note. See also Humphreys v. Guillow, 12 N. H. 385, 38 Am. Dec. 499.

indorser was concerned, he could have signed the firm name in the first place.

9. A stipulation to pay all costs of collecting, not less than ten per cent, refers to attorneys' fees, as the parties are liable for court costs without any stipulation.

10. The indorsement of a waiver of protest, and notice of protest, implies knowledge of all the paper contains at the time, and precludes any defense based on matter then apparent on the face of the instrument.

11. Statement of a witness that a party "examined the note thoroughly" is admissible, where the issue is as to the party's knowledge of the way the note was signed.

12. What a witness has heard as to the character of a person cannot be given in evidence on the part of the person for whom he has testified that he knows the character under inquiry, although such matters may be brought out on cross-examination.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Birmingham City Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce the alleged liability of the indorser of a promissory note. Affirmed.

The note which was the foundation of this suit was as follows:

Birmingham, Ala., Oct. 12, 1887.

Sixty days after date we promise to pay to the order of J. A. Montgomery three thousand dollars, value received, at First National Bank of Birmingham, Ala. The right of exemption to personal property is hereby waived, as provided in the Constitution of the State of Alabama, or any other State in the United States; and it is further agreed that the undersigned shall pay costs for collecting above, not less than 10 per cent on failure to pay at maturity.

[Signed] Percy R. Smith & Co.

This note was indorsed:

Pay to the order of J. D. Crosthwait.
10/12/87. J. A. Montgomery.

The third plea alleges that, after appellant had indorsed the note, the same had been materially changed, with the knowledge of the plaintiff, but without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, by adding to the signature of Percy R. Smith, the words "& Co."

Plaintiff filed a replication setting out that on the 14th day of December, 1887, defendant, with full knowledge of all the facts now averred, in and by his third plea, indorsed on said written instrument the words following, to wit: "'I hereby waive protest and notice of protest on the within note. J. A. Montgomery,'—and at divers times, both before and after the maturity of said instrument, ratified the signature signed thereto, and the supposed alteration of said instrument by said Smith, and promised to pay it; and the plaintiff avers that defendant has waived any right that he may have had to aver and plead the supposed alteration of said instrument, and that by reason of his said waiver and ratification he is now estopped to deny that he is bound by his said indorsement."

Defendant demurred to the replication upon the following grounds: "(1) Because the averment therein that defendant, before and after the maturity of said instrument in writing, ratified the signature by Percy R. Smith of the name of Percy R. Smith & Co. to said instrument in writing, is the averment of a mere conclusion, and not the averment of facts constituting such ratification. (2) Because the promises of payment of said instrument in writing, alleged to have been made by the defendant, appear to have been made without any consideration therefor. (3) Because the waiver of protest and notice made by the defendant and indorsed on said instrument in writing does not, of itself, nor does the promise of payment, alleged to have been made by said defendant, of itself, nor do such waiver and promise of themselves conjointly, operate to estop defendant from denying that he is bound by said indorsement of said instrument in writing, it not appearing from said replication that the plaintiff had been misled thereby to his prejudice." The court overruled each of these grounds of demurrer.

McClellan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One of the prominent questions presented by this record is whether the stipulation in a promissory note to pay all costs of collecting if not paid at maturity destroys its negotiability. Upon no other question in the law, perhaps, are the authorities so irreconcilably, and at the same time so equally, divided, both in respect to the number of adjudged cases and the respectability of the courts upon either hand. The following cases maintain the commercial character of notes which embody the stipulation referred to: Stoneman v. Pyle, 85 Ind. 108; Pate v. Aurora First Nat. Bank, 68 Ind. 254; Maxwell v. Morehart, 66 Ind. 801; Proctor v. Baldwin, 82 Ind. 370; Hubbard v. Harrison, 88 Ind. 827; Heard v. Dubuque County Bank, 8 Neb. 10; Sperry v. Horr, 82 Iowa, 184; *Nickerson v. eler, 14 Fed. Rep. 671; Trader v. Chidester, 41 Ark. 342; Farmers Nat. Bank v. Rasmussen, 1 Dak. 60; Schlesinger v. Arline, 81 Fed. Rep. 648; Hovenstein v. Barnes, 5 Dill. 489; Adams v. Addington, 16 Fed. Rep. 89; and the following sustain the doctrine that the stipulation involves such contingency and uncertainty as to the sum payable as to destroy negotiability: First Nat. Bank v. Bynum, 84 N. C. 24; First Nat. Bank of Trenton v. Gay, 68 Mo. 33; Goodloe v. Taylor, 8 Hawks, 458; First Nat. Bank of Carthage v. Marlow, 71 Mo. 618; Samstag v. Conley, 64 Mo. 476; First Nat. Bank of Carthage v. Jacobs, 78 Mo. 35; Wood v. North, 84 Pa. 407; Johnston v. Speer, 92 Pa. 327; *Stillwater First Nat. Bank v. The question has never been determined in this State. It was mooted somewhat in the case of Hanover Nat. Bank v. Johnson, 90 Ala. 549 (at the last term), and dismissed with an indication on the part of the present writer unfavorable to the negotiability of such instruments. Such was the inclination of my mind at that time. A more careful investigation into the adjudged cases, and especially a more critical consideration of the reasons upon which the divergent conclusions of other courts are made to rest, have produced the contrary conviction, and lead me to adopt the view first advanced by the Indiana and Kentucky courts, and which has since received the sanction of all recognized texts which discuss the point. Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 285; 1 Randolph, Com. Paper, §§ 205, 206; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 62, 62a; Parsons, Notes and Bills, pp. 146, 147; 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 324.

The cardinal principle that the sum to be paid must be certain in amount, and not dependent upon contingencies, is fully recognized and accommodated in this doctrine. It is true, the stipulation involves a contingency, in that there may or may not be any costs of collection to be paid, depending primarily upon failure to pay the note at maturity, and secondarily upon whether the note should be paid, even after dishonor, without resort to attorneys or legal proceedings. It is true, also, that the amount of such costs, if any, is uncertain. But it is fully assured that no costs will be incurred before maturity, and no costs will have to be paid at all, unless there is default in the payment of the sum promised at maturity, and the paper ceases by reason of that fact alone to be a circulating medium, performing in a sense the functions of money; so that, as long as the paper, considered apart from the stipulation, would be negotiable, it will have that character, notwithstanding the stipulation. Looked at in this way, stipulated attorney's fees and costs of collection after maturity stand upon the same footing, as to contingency of liability thereof, and uncertainty as to the amount thereof, as do protest fees, attorneys' tax fees, court costs, and statutory damages in the event a resort is had to legal remedies to enforce payment; and it is not conceivable why the former class of charges should destroy negotiability, while the latter confessedly do not. Stoneman v. Pyle, 85 Ind. 108; Gaar v. Louisville Bkg. Co. 11 Bush, 180.

The Pennsylvania court has said that a "promissory note is a courier without luggage, traveling on the wings of the wind, and should not be lumbered up" with provisions of the class under consideration. Another high authority has declared that a stipulation for attorney's fee is not luggage, but ballast, and does not clog the circulation of the paper, but facilitates its progress. To further pursue the metaphor, it were, we think, more apt to say that the stipulation is neither luggage nor ballast, and neither impedes nor facilitates the flight of the paper through the transactions of commerce, since all persons are presumed to deal with it upon the assumption that it will be paid at maturity; but is for the well-being of the "courier" when its monetary functions have been fully discharged, and its journey as a circulating medium has been brought to an end by default in payment at maturity. Our conclusion is, therefore, that the note sued on here was for a sum certain, the payment of which depended upon no contingency, and, being payable at a bank, is commercial paper, within sections 2094, 2112, 2118, Code 1876, and sections 1756, 1778, Code 1886. The demurrer to the complaint which proceeded on the contrary assumption was properly overruled.

We understand the law to be well settled that a material alteration of a promissory note by any of the parties thereto discharges from liability thereon all other parties not consenting to or authorizing such alteration; and this without regard to whether the alteration is apparently or presumably to the benefit or detriment of the parties objecting. Courts cannot undertake to say that a party would have made the contract as altered, and thus make it for him, merely because its terms are more favorable to him than those embodied in the original instrument, any more than a like conclusion could be justified where the alteration imports additional liability. In the one case no less than in the other the altered paper is not the contract which the party has made; and in neither case can the courts declare it to be his contract, or enforce it as such. The law proceeds on the idea that the identity of the contract has been destroyed, that the contract made is not the contract before the court, that the party did not make the contract which is before the court; and, so adjudging, it cannot go further, and hold him bound by it, on speculations, however probable and plausible, that he would or ought to have entered it in the altered agreement because it involved less liability than the original and only paper executed by him. There are some expressions in the books to the contrary. They will, for the most part, and certainly so far as the adjudications of this court are concerned, be found in cases where the change was prejudicial to the party complaining; and this fact is made one of the reasons for the decision against liability, though it might as well have been rested entirely on the abstract fact of alteration. Thus, in the case of Toomer v. Rutland, 57 Ala. 379, reference is made to the prejudicial character of the alteration, but the conclusion there reached might better have been based solely on the change in the legal identity of the contract,—a doctrine there fully recognized arguendo,—entirely regardless of the effect upon the promisor. It was not decided in that case that an alteration favorable to the party seeking to avoid the instrument would not release him. The sounder doctrine, and certainly the one supported by the overwhelming weight of authority, is that stated in Anderson v. Bellenger, 87 Ala. 384, 4 L. R. A. 680, and there applied to a surety, that any material alteration by one not a stranger to the paper, whether injurious or not, avoids the contract as to all parties not consenting. It is enough that, if the instrument were genuine, it would operate differently from the original; or, as otherwise expressed, avoidance will result "if the alteration is one which causes the paper to speak a language different in legal effect from that which it originally spoke." Mahawie Bank v. Douglass, 81 Conn. 170, 181; Gardner v. Walsh, 5 El. & Bl. 83; Morrill v. Otis, 12 N. H. 466; Reeves v. Pierson, 28 Hun, 185; Humphreys v. Guilloe, 18 N. H. 387; Dickerman v. Mider, 43 Iowa, 506; Lunt v. Silver, 5 Mo. App. 186; 2 Parsons, Notes and Bills, 551-564; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 894; 3 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1743, and many other authorities.

Even were the rules of law otherwise, we are unable to see how appellee could be benefited by it. The appellant might for very good reasons have preferred to indorse for Percy R. Smith in preference to Percy R. Smith & Co., for aught this or the trial court could know. It may be, for instance, that Smith has abundant property to pay his individual debts, while the firm of Smith & Co. may be wholly insolvent, so that the indorser for Smith individually would be saved harmless on a marshaling of assets, while the indorser for Smith & Co., forced to look to firm assets, with only the excess of individual assets after paying individual liabilities, would lose his claim in whole or in part; so that it could not be safely assumed that the change from "Percy R. Smith" to "Percy R. Smith & Co." was beneficial to the indorser. That the alteration was a material one we have no doubt. The considerations just adverted to demonstrate that it was; and the authorities are full to the point that the addition of other names as makers discharges parties already bound by the paper. Cases supra; Wallace v. Jewell, 21 Ohio St. 170; Davis v. Coleman, 7 Ired. L. 424; Hall v. McHenry, 19 Iowa, 521; Henry v. Coates, 17 Ind. 161; Broughton v. Fuller, 9 Vt. 873; Anderson v. Bellenger, 87 Ala. 384, 4 L. R. A. 680.

The effect of adding "& Co." was to make that partnership and the members of it, on the face of the paper, parties to it, whereas only one member of that firm, and he in his individual capacity alone, was a party to the original contract. The precise alteration here involved was adjudged to be a material one in the case of Haskell v. Champion, 80 Mo. 186. Nor is it of moment in this connection that in point of extraneous fact the firm of Smith & Co. was not bound by the signature, because of a want of authority in Smith to sign the firm name to the paper. The court is to determine the materiality of the alteration by an inspection of the instrument. Evidence abundant will be received to show the fact of alteration, and, in a proper case, also that the alteration was in accordance with the intention of the parties; but, with these exceptions, the court cannot, on the question of materiality, look beyond the paper. Considering the original by comparison with the altered paper, it is to determine whether the latter, assuming its genuineness, evidences a contract materially variant from the former. It can make no difference that the parties, the addition of whose names constitutes the alteration, are not in fact bound by the instrument. On the face of it they are bound. On its face, therefore, the contract is not identical with the original. The legal identity of the first is destroyed, and parties not consenting thereto are discharged. Thus, in Haskell v. Champion, supra, it was ruled that the addition of "& Co." to the maker's name discharged the indorser, although there was no such firm, but the maker was a member of another firm. Here the firm clearly was not bound; nobody was in fact bound but the original maker; but on the face of the paper not only he, but a firm of which he was a member, was liable. The question of materiality was determined, not by the outside fact, but by the paper, and the other parties were held to be discharged.

To the pleas which set up the alteration we have been discussing it was replied that the defendant (indorser), with full knowledge of the alteration, indorsed and signed a waiver of protest and notice of protest on the note, "and at divers times, both before and since the maturity of said instrument, ratified the signature signed thereto, and the supposed alteration of said instrument by said Smith, and promised to pay it;" and also, generally, that the defendant had waived the right, and is now estopped to plead said alteration. Eliminating the legal conclusions alleged in these replications, there yet remain two averments of fact that, with full knowledge of the alteration, the defendant waived protest and notice by indorsement of the note over his own signature, and promised to pay the same. This, in our opinion, was a good replication to the matter pleaded, and the several demurrers to it were properly overruled. These facts, standing alone, constitute a waiver of the discharge otherwise operated by the alteration, or the adoption of the act of Smith in making the alteration. The authorities are uniform to the point that such an alteration may be made by the consent of the parties. Ravines v. Alston, 5 Ala. 297; Hill v. Nelms, 86 Ala. 442; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 896; 3 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1766; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. p. 412; 2 Parsons, Notes and Bills, 565. And it is a very general proposition that an act which may be authorized or consented to in limine may be effectually ratified after it has been performed, and ex concessu. Knox v. Armistead, 87 Ala. 511, 5 L. R. A. 297; First Nat. Bank of Trenton v. Gay, 68 Mo. 83, 89; Commercial Bank of Buffalo v. Warren, 15 N. Y. 577. At least it is certain that an alteration such as is shown here may be ratified by the innocent party affected by it, so as to bind him, to all intents and purposes, as if he had fully authorized it in the first instance. National State Bank v. Rising, 4 Hun, 12 L. R. A.

798; Huntington v. Ballou, 2 Lans. 120; Korshaw v. Cox, 3 Esp. 246; Hazard v. Spears, 2 Abb. App. Dec. 853; Kilkelly v. Martin, 34 Wis. 525; Stewart v. First Nat. Bank of Port Huron, 40 Mich. 348; Goodspeed v. Oulter, 75 Ill. 584. And efficient ratification will be implied from facts such as are set forth in these replications. Boans v. Foreman, 60 Mo. 449; Bell v. Mahin, 69 Iowa, 408; Stewart v. First Nat. Bank of Port Huron, supra; Grimstead v. Briggs, 4 Iowa, 559; Union Bank v. Middlebrook, 83 Conn. 95; Carles v. Tattersall, 2 Man. & G. 890; Weed v. Carpenter, 10 Wend. 403; Bowers v. Jewell, 2 N. H. 543.

Whether a new consideration is essential to support the contract thus made by ratification there is some conflict of authority. The courts of Kentucky and Minnesota hold that a new consideration is necessary. Wilson v. Hayes, 40 Minn. 531, 4 L. R. A. 196; Warren v. Pant, 79 Ky. 1. But a great majority of courts of last resort, if, indeed, not all of them, except in the States named, sustain the contrary doctrine. Commercial Bank v. Warren, supra; Patton v. Prescott, 18 Iowa, 567; King v. Hunt, 18 Mo. 97; Prouty v. Wilson, 123 Mass. 297; Goodspeed v. Oulter, 75 Ill. 584; Stewart v. First Nat. Bank of Port Huron, supra.

With respect to this question we adopt the language and conclusion of the Missouri court in a strictly analogous case: "There have been many refinements adopted about this doctrine of ratification; refinements which savor more of subtlety than of sound judgment. With some exceptions, not necessary to be adverted to here, the proposition is, however, undoubtedly correct that he who may authorize in the beginning may ratify in the end. . . . And there is therefore no force in the point urged on our attention, that there would have to be a new consideration in order to attach validity to a confirmatory act. No independent consideration is required in the case of an accommodation indorser, surety, etc., in the first instance; and it is difficult to see why anything more should be required on subsequent sanction than on original assent." First Nat. Bank of Trenton v. Gay, 68 Mo. 89.

Coming now to the bill of exceptions, it is first to be noted that what we have said in relation to ratification of the alleged alteration, and to the effect that ratification may be inferred or implied from circumstances, and need not be supported by a new or distinct consideration, when applied to charges 4, 7, 8, 12, 15 and 19, given at the request of the plaintiff, and charges 8, 16 and 19, asked by the defendant and refused, serves to determine the exceptions reserved to the action of the court in respect thereto against the appellant. The instrument sued on did not bear on its face any evidence of having been altered at any time. The burden of proving that it had been altered after indorsement was, therefore, upon the party who relied on that fact to defeat recovery against him. It follows that appellant's exceptions to charges 1, 2 and 5, given at the instance of plaintiff, and to the refusal of the court to give charges 1, 2, 3, 4, 9 and 18, as requested by defendant, which proceed on the theory that it was upon the plaintiff to disprove the alleged alteration, are untenable. 2

Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1421; 8 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1785; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 898; Bardist v. Trece, 77 Ala. 598.

Charge numbered 5, given for plaintiff, is faulty in one of its clauses, when considered alone, in that it might be construed to authorize the jury to find according to the preponderance of evidence, regardless of whether such preponderance was sufficiently great to reasonably satisfy their minds. This fault is obviated in other portions of the instruction, where it is said the defendant must satisfy the jury by a preponderance of the evidence that the fact in issue is as he alleges it to be; and, even were this otherwise, the appellant could not complain, for the error, if any, in the charge is favorable to him. Mays v. Williams, 27 Ala. 267; Jarrell v. Lellie, 40 Ala. 271; Vandevanter v. Ford, 60 Ala. 610.

There was evidence which tended to show that the note was indorsed by the defendant before it was signed, and was delivered to Smith to be signed in such a way as would enable him to get the money on it for himself and Montgomery. We hold that this agreement, if it existed, authorized Smith, so far as Montgomery was concerned, to sign the firm name of Percy R. Smith & Co. to the paper, since, without any agreement, Smith had the right to fill up the blank by inserting his own name as maker; and to accord any operation to the agreement it must be construed into a consent by the defendant to the subscribing of the name of Smith's firm. Whether Smith had, as between himself and his copartner, the right to so sign, is immaterial. Montgomery's consent to the thing that was done estops him now to object to its having been done, whether Smith, in point of legal fact, had the power to do it or not. Charges 8 and 15, given for the plaintiff, find justification in these considerations. We construe plaintiff's charge numbered 6 to assert that if the note was made on the joint account of Smith and Montgomery, and was indorsed by the latter before it had been signed, but was afterwards, in pursuance of their agreement, executed by attaching thereto the name of Percy R. Smith & Co., Montgomery, having received his share of the proceeds, is bound by his indorsement. So construed, if this instruction has an infirmity, it lies in its being too favorable to the defendant. The fact postulated, that the signature of Smith & Co. was attached in consonance with the previous understanding between Smith and Montgomery, would, of itself, and wholly irrespective of Montgomery's interest in the money borrowed, be quite sufficient to bind him. The appellant can take nothing on his assignment of error directed against this charge. Charges 9, 10, 11, 13 and 16, for plaintiff, as modified by the explanatory charge given in connection therewith, are correct expositions of the familiar rule of law applicable to the filling of blanks left in promissory notes at the time of indorsement. The stipulation to "pay all costs of collecting not less than ten per cent," must be construed to refer to other than court costs, since the parties bound on the paper are liable for those without any agreement to pay them. Other costs of collection ordinarily consist of attorney's fees; and the stipulation may be interpreted as if it provided for the payment of 10 per cent 12 L. R. A.

attorney's fees, or a greater amount than that if expended reasonably and properly in realizing on the note. Stipulations to pay a given per cent for the services of attorneys are held to import liability for reasonable compensation for legal services rendered in that behalf, not in excess of the amount limited. We do not think the stipulation here is for more than this, and hence, that it can be enforced to this extent in the present action. Charge 5, asked by defendant, was well refused.

It would unduly extend this opinion, and serve no good purpose, to discuss the remaining charges requested by the appellant in detail. Enough has already been said, we think, to show that they severally are either affirmatively bad, as stating propositions which are unsound, or are abstract or misleading, or invasive of the province of the jury. Not a few of them, for instance, are addressed to the question of defendant's estoppel to rely upon the alleged alteration, and set forth that this, that and the other fact does not estop him to avail himself of it. This matter of estoppel was not nearly so prominent in the case as the question of ratification and promise to pay after knowledge of the alteration; and the tendency of all these charges was to mislead the jury into discharging the defendant because he was not technically estopped to set up this defense, although they may have been fully satisfied that the defendant, being let in to make this defense, had utterly failed to sustain it with evidence. Moreover, we are by no means prepared to say that the proposition of these charges is absolutely correct. On the contrary, we apprehend that the indorsement of a waiver of protest and notice of protest on a paper, as shown here, implies knowledge of all the paper contained at that time, and was such a recognition of its binding force as a contract as precludes the party from making any defense based on matters then apparent upon the face of the instrument; and certainly such would be the effect when the indorsement of the waiver is accompanied by a promise to pay the note.

We have examined the trial court's rulings on evidence to which exceptions were reserved, and find no error in them. The statement of the witness Smith that the loan of stock by Montgomery to him to enable him to borrow money upon its security "was not considered a debt between us," considered with the context of his answer to the interrogatory, was no more or less than to say that there was no agreement that he should pay Montgomery for the stock, the clear implication being that when it had performed the purposes of the loan—that is, had been used as collateral by Smith—it should be returned in specie to Montgomery.

The statement of plaintiff, made as a witness, that the defendant at a certain time "examined the note thoroughly," the issue being whether he knew that it was signed as by Percy R. Smith & Co., was but a "short-hand" rendering of the facts involved in reading the paper and ascertaining all of its contents. It was properly admitted. Woodstock v. Roberts, 87 Ala. 486; Perry v. State, 87 Ala. 80.

It has come to be a familiar rule of law in this State that a witness as to character may, on cross-examination, be interrogated as to what he has heard in the community touching the character of the party inquired about. This is to afford a test of the value of his evidence in chief; to show that his conclusion as to the reputation in issue, and which rests upon the estimation of the community, is not supported by the expressions of that estimation, and thus to weaken its force. Such expressions cannot be given in evidence by the party whose witness is being examined, and who testified that he knows the character under inquiry. He must state what that character is as upon his own knowledge, and is not allowed to substitute for his knowledge the means or sources of it. On these principles, the action of the city court in refusing to allow the witness Mudd to testify to the character of the adverse criticism he had testified to on cross-examination as having heard on the character of Smith, and in excluding the evidence of Read, given in chief, that "he had heard a good many people say they would not believe Smith on oath," was unobjectionable. The ruling as to Mudd's testimony, moreover, may be sustained on the further ground that it involved no injury to appellant, in that he had already deposed to the character of the criticisms which he had heard with respect to Smith's character, to the effect that they were "severe" expressions condemnatory of Smith.

We find no error in this record, and the judgment of the City Court is affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS (2d Div.).

Edward A. DURANT, Jr., Resp't.,
v.

Henry R. PIERSON et al., Appts.

(.....N. Y. ....)

Money loaned to a surviving partner for the express purpose of paying the debts of the firm, and so used, creates a valid claim in equity against the assets of the firm, and may be treated as such in a subsequent assignment for creditors of the firm, although the firm was in fact insolvent at the time of the loan, where this fact was not known either by the lender or the survivor.

(Vann, J., dissents.)

(March 17, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming a judgment entered in the office of the Clerk of Albany County upon the report of a referee in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to set aside an assignment for benefit of creditors upon the ground that it was fraudulent and void, because made with intent to hinder, delay and defraud creditors. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Marcus T. Hun, for appellants:

A surviving partner may make a general assignment of the firm property with preferences.

Haynes v. Brooks, 116 N. Y. 487; Williams v. Whedon, 12 Cent. Rep. 227, 109 N. Y. 533.

The rights of the firm creditors of the firm assets must be worked out through the equities existing between the partners, and only thus.

Saunders v. Reilly, 7 Cent. Rep. 59, 105 N. Y. 19.

The equity ceases when one partner acquires the entire firm property. He is then vested with the title to the property free from any lien or equity in favor of the partnership creditors, and may make an assignment by which he prefers his individual creditors to those of the firm, in the payment of their debts out of the firm assets.

Dimon v. Hazard, 32 N. Y. 65; Stanton v. Westover, 2 Cent. Rep. 189, 101 N. Y. 265; Smith v. Howard, 20 How. Pr. 121; Fitzpatrick 12 L. R. A.

v. Flannagan, 106 U. S. 648, 27 L. ed. 211; Story, Partn. § 358.

A surviving partner may borrow money to pay firm obligations and repay the same from the firm assets.

Haynes v. Brooks, 8 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 106. See Fitzpatrick v. Flannagan, supra; Emerson v. Senter, 118 U. S. 8, 30 L. ed. 51; Butchart v. Dresser, 4 De G. M. & G. 542; Braaford Com. Bkg. Co. v. Cure, L. R. 81 Ch. Div. 326; Williams v. Whedon, supra; Nehrboss v. Bliss, 88 N. Y. 600.

Under the circumstances of this case, in view of the fact of the agreement made by the surviving partner with the Bank that this money would be paid back out of the firm assets, that the note was given in the firm name, the amount credited to the firm account, that it was used to pay firm debts, and the mistake of fact as to the solvency of the firm, equity will give a lien upon the firm assets.

Perry v. Board of Missions, 3 Cent. Rep. 62, 102 N. Y. 99; Fowler v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 28 Hun, 195; Smith v. Smith, 51 Hun, 164.

Mr. G. L. Stedman, for respondent:

The debt of $15,000 contracted by the survivor was his individual debt, and not a debt for which the firm assets were liable.

There is no principle of equity that can be successfully invoked in this case to change this legal status.

1. There is no right of subrogation on the part of the Bank. This right exists only where a surety, being liable to pay the debt of his principal, pays it. He can then be subrogated to all the creditor's rights.

Mr. Abraham Lansing, for the National Commercial Bank:

The note was purely a promise binding the firm property, so far as it could be made such by the only person authorized to sign the firm name, and whose signature of the firm name would, at that time, have been binding upon the firm property for purposes not easily distinguishable.

Haight, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to set aside an assignment made by the defendant Henry R. Pierson, as survivor of the late firm of Henry R. Pierson & Son, to the defendant Robert C. Pruyn, for the benefit of creditors, upon the ground that it was fraudulent and void as against the creditors of the firm for the reason that it directed the payment to the National Commercial Bank of the sum of $15,000. The referee has found as facts that Henry R. Pierson, the elder, died on the 1st day of January, 1890, leaving the defendant Henry R. Pierson, his son, as the sole surviving member of the firm; that the firm kept an account with the National Commercial Bank of Albany, in the name of Henry R. Pierson & Son, which was open and unsettled upon the books of the Bank on the 9th day of January, 1890, at which time the defendant Pierson made application to the Bank for the loan of $15,000; that upon making such loan there was credited upon the books of the Bank to the firm the sum so loaned, and a note was given therefor, payable on demand, signed in the name of the firm by Henry R. Pierson, survivor; that $10,150 thereof was subsequently drawn out of the Bank by the checks of the defendant Henry R. Pierson, signed by him as survivor, and the same was applied and used in the payment of the debts of the firm. The referee further found as facts that the purpose of said defendant Henry R. Pierson in applying for and obtaining such loan was to procure money with which to pay the obligations of the firm which had matured, or were about to mature and that the Bank understood such to be the purpose of the loan at the time of making the same; that the firm was in fact insolvent on the 1st day of January, 1890, at the time of the decease of the elder Pierson, but that such fact was not known to either the defendant Pierson or the National Commercial Bank at the time the loan was made. He further found as a fact that in inserting in the assignment the direction to pay the National Commercial Bank of Albany from the firm property the amount of the note, the defendant Pierson acted with intent to hinder, delay and defraud the creditors of the firm, but that at the time of making such assignment the defendant Pierson believed that such note was a firm obligation, or an obligation which was legally enforceable against the property and assets of the firm, and that he therefore was not morally chargeable with wrong in directing its payment out of the property of the firm; that the appropriation by him of the money borrowed of the Bank to the payment of the firm debts created a claim in his favor against the estate, which, before the assignment, could have been properly paid out of the firm's assets. As a conclusion of law he found that the debt created by the loan by the National Commercial Bank was the individual debt of the defendant Pierson, and not that of the firm; that the assignment was consequently fraudulent as to the plaintiff, and directed judgment accordingly. If the debt created by the loan be the individual liability of the survivor, and one that the firm ought not to pay, and the firm be insolvent, the survivor had no right in his assignment to direct its payment out of the firm's assets, and by so doing the assignment was rendered fraudulent as to the creditors of the firm. Wilson v. Robertson, 21 N. Y. 587; Menagh v. Whitwell, 52 N. Y. 146; Second Nat. Bank v. Burt, 98 N. Y. 233-245; Bulger v. Rosa, 119 N. Y. 459-465.

It thus becomes important to determine whether the loan contracted by the survivor became a firm obligation for the payment of which its assets may justly be applied. As we have seen, the note given upon procuring such loan bore the name of the firm and that of Henry R. Pierson, as survivor, but at the time that this note was given it was known to all the parties concerned that the senior member of the firm had died. The death of a partner puts an end to the copartnership, and there is no longer any power or authority of the surviving partners to carry on for the future a partnership trade or business, or to engage in new transactions, contracts or liabilities on account thereof. Story, Partn. §§ 842, 848; Hall v. Lanning, 91 U. S. 160-170, 23 L. ed. 271-274; Farr v. Morrill, 53 Hun, 81.

It is thus apparent that while the note in form would appear to create an obligation of the firm, it is at law unavailable as such, for the reason that there was no power in the survivor to make it; but it does not follow but that it is a claim which ought in justice and equity to be paid out of the firm's assets. If it is, the preference in the assignment would not be void, for the law will not declare fraudulent that which equity adjudges right and proper. Denton v. Merrill, 48 Hun, 224-229.

We must therefore consider whether there are equities which will support the claim of the Bank to be paid out of such assets. It is apparent that the money borrowed from the Bank by the survivor was for the purpose of paying the creditors of the firm the claims then matured and pressing. The amount of the loan was credited upon the open account of the firm with the Bank, and subsequently $10,000 thereof or thereabouts was drawn out by the survivor upon his check, and used in payment of the liabilities of the firm. At the time this loan was made it was not supposed by the officers of the Bank or the surviving partner that the firm was insolvent, and no question is made but that both parties acted in good faith. The question is therefore presented whether a surviving partner may in good faith borrow money for the express purpose of paying the debts of his firm, and, by so applying the money borrowed, create an equity for the satisfaction of which the assets of the firm may properly be devoted. As we have seen, the survivor became entitled to the assets, which he had the right to sell, mortgage and dispose of in order to pay the debts and close up the affairs of the copartnership. If he had the power to sell or mortgage, it would seem to follow that he had the power to borrow and pledge the assets for the repayment of the loan; and, the amount borrowed having been faithfully applied in liquidation of the debts of the copartnership, equity will recognize the justness of the claim of the party making the loan. Cases may arise where the exercise of such authority may be highly expedient if not necessary, for the preservation of the rights of creditors and persons interested in the distribution of the assets of the firm; as, for instance, creditors, may by levy expose the assets to a forced public sale under circumstances which would work great sacrifice to the estate. In case a survivor should be insolvent, he might be able to raise money by a pledge to repay out of the partnership assets when he could not obtain it upon his own credit. We do not see that harm could result to the other creditors by permitting this to be done, for it would not increase the obligations of the firm, or lessen their share in the distribution of the assets in case the firm be insolvent. It is not questioned but that the survivor had the right to turn out as a security or pledge the assets of the firm in payment for the money received by him. He could have sold the assets and repaid the money loaned at any time before executing the assignment, and without the taint of fraud. It is not apparent how the rights of the parties are changed and the act of the survivor made fraudulent by doing that in the assignment which he had the right to do immediately before executing it.

The precise question involved in this case does not appear to have been passed upon in any reported case, so far as we have been able to discover, except in Haynes v. Brooks, 8 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 106-113, where an assignment was made for the benefit of creditors by a surviving partner. In that case, as in this, the creditors had loaned money to the surviving partner to pay a note of the firm. Van Vorst, J., in commenting upon the transaction, said: "If a firm obligation was retired by the use of the money loaned or advanced by Brown & Co. the surviving partner would have been entitled to be repaid out of the firm property. As the moneys of Brown & Co. in fact paid a firm obligation, I see no objection in the subrogation of them in equity to the rights of the surviving partner or to the regarding of them as entitled to be repaid out of the firm assets. That works injustice to no one." The learned judge concluded by ordering the complaint dismissed, thereby sustaining the validity of the assignment. This case was affirmed in the general term (42 Hun, 528), and in this court in 116 N. Y. 487. This question, however, was not considered in either of the appellate courts.

In Ex parte Davis, 5 Whart. 580, it was held that after the dissolution of a copartnership the partner authorized to settle the estate may borrow money on the credit of the firm for the purpose of paying its debts, and, if the credit be given in good faith, though with a knowledge of the dissolution, and the money borrowed be faithfully applied in liquidation of the debts of the partnership, the creditor has a claim against the firm assets, and is not to be considered as a creditor merely of the partner borrowing.

In the case of Prudhomme v. Henry, 5 La. Ann. 700, it was held that, where a liquidating partner after dissolution has borrowed money to pay the debts of the firm, the partnership is liable so far as the evidence shows that the money was used for the benefit of the firm. In the last two cases the partnerships were not insolvent, and the question arose as between the partners. The courts, however, recognized the claim of the lender as one which ought to be paid by the partnership. In the case under consideration it is true that the partnership is insolvent, and the question arises as between the Bank and creditors of the partnership, but the creditors have not been harmed or prejudiced by the action of the Bank in loaning the money to the survivor, for the assets were increased in value to the amount of the loan, and the money drawn out of the Bank was applied in extinguishment of the claims of the creditors, thus reducing to that extent the liabilities of the firm. When a partnership is dissolved by the death of a partner the survivor is entitled to the possession and control of the joint property for the purpose of closing its business, and to that end and for that purpose he may, according to the settled principles of the Law of Partnership, administer the affairs of the firm, and by sale, mortgage or other reasonable disposition of the property make provision for meeting its obligations. He may, for that purpose, borrow money, and give a valid pledge of the copartnership property for its repayment. Williams v. Whedon, 109 N. Y. 883, 12 Cent. Rep. 227; Emerson v. Senter, 118 U. S. 3-8, 30 L. ed. 49-51; Fitzpatrick v. Flannagan, 106 U. S. 648, 27 L. ed. 211; Butchart v. Dresser, 4 De G. M. & G. 542, 10 Hare, 458; Bradford Com. Bkq. Co. v. Cure, L. R. 31 Ch. Div. 326.

In Case v. Beauregard, 99 U. S. 119-124, 25 L. ed. 370, 371, Mr. Justice Strong, in commenting upon the rights of partners in a suit involving the marshaling of the assets, says: "The right of each partner extends only to the share of what may remain after payment of the debts of the firm and a settlement of its accounts. Growing out of this right, or, rather, included in it, is the right to have the partnership property applied to the payment of the partnership debts in preference to those of any individual partner. This is an equity that partners have as between themselves, and in certain circumstances it inures to the benefit of the creditors of the firm. The latter are said to have the privilege or preference, sometimes loosely denominated a 'lien,' to have the debts due to them paid out of the assets of a firm in course of liquidation to the exclusion of the creditors of its several members. This equity is a derivative one. It is not held or enforceable in their own right. It is practically a subrogation to the equity of the individual partner, to be made effective only through him. Hence, if he is not in a condition to enforce it, the creditors of the firm cannot be. Rice v. Barnard, 20 Vt. 479; York County Bank's App. 82 Pa. 446. But so long as the equity of the partner remains in him,—so long as he retains an interest in the firm assets as a partner,—a court of equity will allow the creditors of the firm to avail themselves of his equity, and enforce through it the application of those assets primarily to the payment of the debts due them whenever the property comes under its administration."

In the case of Saunders v. Reilly, 105 N. Y. 12, 7 Cent. Rep. 59, it was held that a mere general creditor of a firm, having no execution or attachment, has no lien whatever upon its personal assets. That, while firm creditors are entitled to a preference over creditors of the individual members of the firm in the payment of their debts out of the assets in the course of liquidation, their equity is not held or enforceable in their own right, but is a derivative one, practically a subrogation of the equity of each individual partner to have the firm assets applied primarily to the payment of its debts; and where no such equity exists in favor of any member of the firm the firm creditors have none; and, therefore, where a judgment is recovered against all the members of a firm upon a joint obligation, but not an indebtedness of the firm, the firm property may be levied upon and sold on execution issued on the judgment. See also Dimon v. Hazard, 32 N. Y. 84; Stanton v. Westover, 101 N. Y. 265, 3 Cent. Rep. 189; Kirby v. Schoonmaker, 8 Barb. Ch. 46, 5 L. ed. 809; Brown v. Higginbotham, 5 Leigh, 588, 37 Am. Dec. 618; Peyton v. Stratton, 7 Gratt. 380; Stebbins v. Willard, 53 Vt. 665. It appears to us that the conclusion is warranted from the authorities referred to that where a person in good faith loans money to a surviving partner, and where the money is faithfully applied by such partner in satisfaction of the liabilities of the firm, the claim becomes one which in equity should be paid out of the assets of the firm; and in an accounting between the survivor with the personal representatives of the deceased partner equity will recognize the right of the surviving partner to have the money so borrowed and applied by him repaid out of the assets of the firm, and an assignment so directing is not fraudulent. Attention is called to the fact that the deceased partner left a will making the survivor his sole devisee and legatee, and it is claimed that he left no individual debts. If this were so, it is not apparent that it would affect the equities of the bank; but the evidence is silent upon the question as to whether or not the deceased left individual debts. The referee refused to so find, and we cannot assume that there were none. It may also be claimed that, the firm being insolvent, the survivor has no equities to which the Bank can be subrogated for the reason that he is liable individually for the payment of the firm debts. But the Bank is not asking for any relief by way of subrogation; it is only defending the provision already made for it in the assignment from the claim of fraud. Even though both the firm and the survivor were insolvent, the survivor still had the right to have his contract recognized, and to say which of the creditors should be paid first, and to so provide in his assignment. Williams v. Whedon, supra.

It follows that the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the final award of costs. All concur, except Vann, J., dissenting, and Potter, J., not voting.

Vann, J., dissents upon the ground that the note preferred in the assignment as a firm debt was simply the individual debt of the surviving partner, who, as he did not bind the firm in creating the debt, could bind neither it nor its property by directing payment out of the firm assets.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

CITY OF OLYMPIA, Appt.,

v.

C. B. MANN.

(November 21, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Thurston County overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to enjoin defendant from interfering with the erection by plaintiff of a wooden building within the fire limits established by a city ordinance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles H. Ayer and B. F. Denison, for appellant:

The charter gives the City power to make regulations for the prevention of accidents by fire.

This includes the power to establish "fire limits" and to prohibit the erection of wooden buildings therein.

Green v. Cape May, 41 N. J. L. 45; Macdon v. Patty, 57 Miss. 378.

The propriety and mode of exercising the power is a question solely for the legislative body exercising it.

Knoxville v. Bird, 12 Lea, 121, 47 Am. Rep. 336; State v. Mott, 61 Md. 297, 48 Am. Rep. 105.

Courts will not investigate the reasonableness of an ordinance unless the same is plainly and clearly unreasonable on its face.

Horr & Bemis, Mun. Pol. Ord. §§ 127, 129.

Courts refuse to interfere with the exercise of discretion by the municipality except in cases of gross abuse.

Van Baalen v. People, 40 Mich. 258; Ex parte Delaney, 43 Cal. 476; Ex parte Smith, 38 Cal. 709; Dillon, Mun. Corp. 94, 95.

1. An ordinance establishing fire limits within which wooden buildings cannot be erected is authorized by a city charter giving the city power to make regulations for the prevention of fire, provided such means are proper or necessary to the accomplishment of the end in view.

2. Where a city is given power to make regulations for the prevention of fire and the propriety or necessity of the methods to be pursued to accomplish that object is left to the discretion of the council the courts will not be warranted in setting aside as improper an ordinance adopting means which the council has by its acts declared proper.

3. A court should not set aside a municipal ordinance for unreasonableness, unless it is manifestly so on its face, or is based on fraud, or was passed in wanton disregard of private rights, or exceeded the power of the council.

4. The reservation by a city council to itself, in an ordinance establishing fire limits within which the erection of wooden buildings is prohibited, of the right to grant special permits for the erection of such buildings within such limits does not make the ordinance so unreasonable as to render it void.

(Stiles, J., dissents from proposition 4.)

NOTE.—Power of municipality to prescribe fire limits and prohibit the erection of wooden buildings therein.

In Klinger v. Bickel, 10 Cent. Rep. 381, 117 Pa. 326, Paxson, J., says: "No one at this day doubts the power of the Legislature to prohibit the erection of wooden buildings within the limits of a city or borough, nor that the Legislature may confer the same power upon municipal corporations such as cities and boroughs." See also Com. v. Tewksbury, 11 Met. 53.

The leading case upon the topic appears to be Republica v. Duquet, 2 Yeates, 493, which upheld a law directing the corporation of Philadelphia to pass ordinances to prevent the erection of wooden buildings in certain parts of the city as they might think proper.

As to what is necessary to invest a municipality with the power, there is some diversity of opinion. The two cases in which the question was first decided—Wadleigh v. Gilman, 12 Me. 403, and Hudson v. Thorne, 7 Paige, 261, 4 L. ed. 148—seem to directly conflict. The former holds that a city charter authorizing the common council to ordain and establish such acts, laws and regulations, not inconsistent with the laws of the State, as shall be needful to the good order of said body politic, would permit the passage of an ordinance prohibiting the erection of wooden buildings within certain limits. The following cases have held that the power to prevent the erection of wooden buildings was conferred by a general welfare clause, with the addition, perhaps, of special authority "to secure the prevention of fire": Salem v. Maynes, 123 Mass. 372; Alexander v. Greenville, 54 Miss. 669; Ford v. Thrallkill, 84 Ga. 169; Charleston v. Reed, 27 W. Va. 687.

Hudson v. Thorne, supra, on the other hand, held that charter authority "to adopt and establish such regulations for the prevention or suppression of fires as might be necessary" did not confer authority to restrict the erection of wooden or frame buildings within the city. This decision was stated to be obiter dictum in the subsequent case of Troy v. Winters, 2 Hun. 64.

Pye v. Peterson, 45 Tex. 315, however, followed the doctrine hinted at in Hudson v. Thorne, supra, by holding that without an express grant of power a city cannot establish fire limits and declare wooden buildings erected therein to be nuisances. See also Kneedler v. Norristown, 100 Pa. 371; Charleston v. Reed, supra.

In the following cases the municipal charter or the general laws have been held sufficient to authorize the establishment of fire limits by the municipality. Ex parte Fiske, 73 Cal. 125; McCloskey v. Kreling, 76 Cal. 511; Knoxville v. Bird, 12 Lea, 121; Hine v. New Haven, 40 Conn. 473.

Brady v. Northwestern Ins. Co., 11 Mich. 425, seemed to expand the doctrine a little, holding that the City of Detroit had power to pass ordinances establishing fire limits within which the rebuilding or repair of wooden buildings should be forbidden, although no charter authority is referred to and there is no intimation that such authority is necessary.

Monroe v. Hoffman, 29 Ia. Ann. 651, held that municipal corporations had inherent power, independent of legislative grant, to forbid the erection of buildings with combustible materials within the densely built-up parts of the town. This doctrine was cited with approval in Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 575.

The general question of the power to establish fire limits was raised in Keokuk v. Scroggs, 39 Iowa, 447, and denied under a charter fully as broad as many which other courts have held to confer such power, the court placing its ruling upon the

A municipal corporation has inherent power, independent of any legislative grant, to prohibit the erection of wooden buildings in the densely built-up parts of a city.

Monroe v. Hoffman, 29 La. Ann. 651, 29 Am. Rep. 845; Horr & Bemis, Mun. Pol. Ord. §§ 221, 222; Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 89, and note; Barbier v. Connolly, 118 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923.

Municipal corporations with power to provide for the safety of their inhabitants may establish "fire limits," and prevent erection therein of wooden buildings.

1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 405; Wadleigh v. Gilman, 12 Me. 408.

The council must necessarily exercise judgment and discretion in granting permits, and when this power is not clearly abused and made a pretext for doing a wrong to an individual, courts will not interfere with municipal discretion.

1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 94, and notes; Van Baalen v. People, Ex parte De Laney and Barbier v. Connolly, supra; Soon Hing v. Crowley, 118 U. S. 708, 28 L. ed. 1148.

Courts are bound to presume that the corporate authorities will properly exercise the discretion with which they are clothed, and that they had sufficient reasons for doing the act, the result of such discretion.

Mr. J. W. Robinson and Cavanaugh & Fitch for appellee.

Anders, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee, being the owner of a vacant lot on Fourth Street, in Olympia, described as lot 1 in block 24 of the Town (now City) of Olympia, and being desirous of erecting thereon a two-story frame building to be used as store-rooms and offices, applied to the city council of said City, in accordance with section 8 of Ordinance No. 304 of said City, entitled "An Ordinance Defining the Fire Limits, and to Protect Property from Fire," approved April 24, 1889, for a permit to erect said building. The said lot being within the fire limits, as established by said ordinance, the city council refused permission to erect the proposed building, and notified appellee not to undertake the erection of the same. Appellee thereupon brought this action to perpetually enjoin and restrain the City and its officers from, in any manner, enforcing, or attempting to enforce, said ordinance against him or his employees laboring upon said building. In his complaint he alleges substantially, in addition to the facts above mentioned, that the boundaries of said fire limits, as fixed by said ordinance, are unreasonable, injurious and inequitable, and the same was passed with a desire to force brick and stone buildings on Fourth and Main Streets, and increase the value of neighboring property at the expense of those intending to fact that the charter had been amended and the powers of the corporation restricted and defined.

The Louisiana court does not seem inclined to extend the doctrine of Monroe v. Hoffman, supra, for in State v. Schuchardt, 43 La. Ann. 48, without mentioning the former case, it held that a charter authority to prevent the reconstruction in wood of old buildings within the fire limits did not authorize the forbidding of necessary repairs to such buildings with the same kind of materials used in the original construction, in this case the use of shingles in repairing a roof.

Reservation of power to permit building within the limits.

The question as to the effect of a reservation of power to grant permits to build within the prohibited limits does not appear to have been directly passed upon.

There are some cases in which the question has been passed upon incidentally, as Hine v. New Haven, 40 Conn. 478, where an ordinance containing such a reservation was held justified by the charter, and Welch v. Hotchkiss, 39 Conn. 140, where the requirement of a license fee for the privilege of building within the prohibited limits was held proper.

Newton v. Belger, 3 New Eng. Rep. 725, 143 Mass. 598, held that statutory authority to pass such ordinances regulating the construction, material and use of buildings as are necessary "for the prevention of fire and preservation of life," did not justify the passage of an ordinance that "no person shall erect, alter or rebuild, or essentially change, any building or any part thereof for any purpose other than a dwelling-house, without first obtaining in writing a permit from the board of aldermen." The court said: The ordinance "does not merely forbid the erection of any building which is hazardous or which exposes other property or persons to danger. It does not require the aldermen to adjudicate and determine that it is necessary to prohibit any proposed building for the purpose of securing the prevention of fire or the preservation of life. On the contrary it gives them the power, by refusing a permit, to prevent the erection of any building . . . for any reason which may be satisfactory to them. . . . They may refuse a permit because in their opinion it is desirable that certain parts of the city shall be used only for handsome dwelling-houses, and that all buildings for the purposes of trade should be excluded, though in no sense dangerous. . . . The ordinance is broader than the Statute in its scope, and cannot be justified as a reasonable exercise of the authority conferred by the statute."

Many of the ordinances contain the reservation clause (see Keokuk v. Scroggs, 39 Iowa, 447; Klingler v. Bickel, 10 Cent. Rep. 333, 117 Pa. 326; Troy v. Winters, 2 Hun, 68), while others do not. See Ford v. Thrallkill, 84 Ga. 109; Douglass v. Com. 2 Rawle, 232; Kneidler v. Norristown, 100 Pa. 368.

To bring certainty out of this uncertainty little help can be had from decisions on analogous questions. Even cases like Ex parte Fluke, 72 Cal. 126, and King v. Davenport, 98 Ill. 300, which held a reservation clause valid so far as it related to alterations and repairs in buildings already erected, are of little assistance since many reasons exist for permitting repairs which would not justify the erection of new buildings and the question whether alterations and repairs should be allowed could not be fixed by an inflexible rule without working much needless hardship, while it would seem that a rule with reference to fire limits and the erection therein of wooden buildings would be much more just if it was fixed so as to apply equally and uniformly in all cases improve; and that since the passage of said ordinance, and the rejection of plaintiff's application for a permit, the said City has granted permits for the erection of wooden buildings within said fire limits, but not on Main or Fourth Streets, whereby the danger of conflagration has been much more increased than it would be by the erection of plaintiff's desired building; that said ordinance is null and void; that the said City had and has no authority to create or maintain fire limits; that the ordinance is void also for want of conformity to the city charter, and federal laws, even if the City had such power, that a court of equity should prohibit its enforcement; that the City has no authority to declare anything a nuisance, and only has authority to abate such nuisances as are known and defined by statute.

The complaint further sets forth the penalty prescribed by said ordinance for its violation, and avers that the defendant, the City of Olympia, through its marshal, threatens to arrest plaintiff, and all those who may be found at work on said building; that he has a large number of men employed and ready to commence work on said building, and that unless the City and its officers are restrained and prohibited from enforcing said ordinance plaintiff will suffer great and irreparable damage, for which there is no speedy or adequate remedy at law, and that the threatened arrests will create great and vexatious litigation. To this complaint the defendant filed a general demurrer, which was overruled by the court, and, defendant electing to stand upon the demurrer, judgment was rendered for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals to this court.

We are therefore called upon to decide the question whether the city ordinance complained of is or is not valid, or, in other words, whether the city council were legally empowered to pass it. This ordinance, after setting out the boundaries of the fire limits within the City, among other things, provides as follows: "Sec. 7. No wooden building shall be constructed within the fire limits, provided that the city council may grant permits to construct wooden buildings within the fire limits as hereinafter provided. . . . Sec. 10. Any person who shall erect, or cause to be erected, or assist in the erection of, any building contrary to the provisions of this ordinance, or shall maintain and refuse to remove any building erected contrary to the provisions of this ordinance for ten days after receiving notice to remove the same from the fire wardens, shall, upon conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined in any sum not greater than $100, or be imprisoned in the city jail not more than thirty days, or be both fined and imprisoned, at the discretion of the court."

This ordinance is assailed by counsel for appellee upon the ground that the city charter did not authorize its passage, and upon the further ground that it is unreasonable, or rather that the boundaries of the fire limits are "unreasonable, injurious and inequitable."

Among the powers granted to the City of Olympia by its charter, and which are relied on by appellant to sustain the ordinance in question, are these: "The City of Olympia shall have power to make regulations for the prevention of accidents by fire, to organize and establish a fire department, and make and ordain rules for the government of the same; to provide fire engines, and other apparatus, and to levy and collect special taxes for that purpose; . . . to prevent, by all possible and proper means, danger or risk of injury or damages by fire arising from carelessness, negligence or otherwise; . . . to adopt proper ordinances for the government of the City, and to carry into effect the powers given by this Act; . . . and the City of Olympia shall have such other powers and privileges, not herein specially enumerated, as are incident to municipal corporations of like character and degree."

The learned counsel for appellee contends with much earnestness that, notwithstanding these legislative grants, the City had no power to enact the ordinance, for the reason that the powers, if any, conferred by the charter are general in their nature, and that a special grant of power is necessary to authorize the establishment of fire limits, or the prevention of the erection of wooden buildings within the City. To sustain this position counsel cites, among others, the following, as especially in point: Keokuk v. Scroggs, 39 Iowa, 447; Pye v. Peterson, 45 Tex. 812; Kneedler v. Norristown, 100 Pa. 368; Champaign v. Harmon, 98 Ill. 491, and Hudson v. Thorne, 7 Paige, 261, 4 L. ed. 148.

In the case of Keokuk v. Scroggs it appears that the original charter conferred a general power upon the city to make such ordinances as should be necessary to secure the city and its inhabitants from injury by fire. This charter was amended, and the amendment contained a full and specific enumeration of the acts which the city might do for the purposes of guarding against calamities by fire. In the enumeration of powers in the amended charter nothing was said about the control of wood or lumber yards. The defendant was prosecuted for the violation of that portion of the city ordinance relating to the location of lumber yards within the fire limits. And the court said: "The power to pass an ordinance requiring the removal of a lumber yard from a specified portion of the city is not expressly conferred in the charter, nor can it be claimed that it is necessary to make the power conferred available." And further that the general provision contained in the original charter has become absorbed in the particular enumeration in the amendment. "Therefore whatever power is conferred upon the city respecting fires must be found in the amendment to the charter." There being neither a general nor special power in the charter authorizing the city to enact the ordinance as to lumber yards, the court held no such power existed.

The case of Pye v. Peterson, 45 Tex. 812, was a case involving the validity of a fire ordinance. The charter provided generally that the city might have power to "ordain and establish such acts, laws, regulations and ordinances not inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of this State as shall be needful for the government, interests, welfare and good order of said body politic," also "to abate and remove nuisances and to punish the authors thereof by penalties, fine and imprisonment, and to define and declare what shall be nuisances." And the court said that "without an express grant a city cannot establish fire limits, declare wooden buildings erected therein to be nuisances, and provide for the removal of such buildings and the punishment of those erecting them." And in this case the court also said: "The form of the ordinance indicates that it was framed under the latter clause." And the point really decided was that the council had no power to declare wooden buildings to be nuisances.

In the case of Kneidler v. Norristown, 100 Pa. 368, the court says: "The charter of the Borough of Norristown contains no authority to the council to enact ordinances prohibiting the erection of wooden buildings. Nor is there anything in the grant of general powers conferred upon the borough from which such an authority can be necessarily inferred or to which it is indispensable." But the court was apparently influenced in its decision by the fact that the Legislature had previously assumed jurisdiction of the subject, and had expressly enacted that wooden buildings should not be erected on certain streets of the town, which fact was a very strong reason for the conclusion that it had not delegated the power claimed to the borough itself. And further, the court seems to concede that if the power to enact the ordinance had been conferred by the charter of the borough, or could necessarily be implied from any of the provisions thereof, it would have been valid.

The controversy in the case of Champaign v. Harmon, 98 Ill. 491, arose out of a claim made by the city to certain real estate purchased by it at a tax-sale; and the court very properly held that, while the city had the power to purchase and hold real estate necessary for corporate purposes, it could not do so for the purposes of speculation without special power granted to that end.

The case of Hudson v. Thorne, 7 Paige, 261, 4 L. ed. 148, seems strongly to support the position of appellee. Other cases are also cited by counsel bearing more or less directly upon the point; but, in view of the provisions of the charter under consideration, and of the decisions of other courts of high standing and ability to the contrary, we do not feel bound by these decisions. In fact we do not think they are sustained by the better reason, or by the weight of authority.

Judge Dillon defines the powers possessed by municipal corporations to be (1) those granted in express terms; (2) those necessarily or fairly implied in or incidental to the power given; and (3) those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation. 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 89.

And taking this to be a correct statement of the law, it follows that if the charter of Olympia, either expressly or by necessary or fair implication, gave the city council authority to enact the fire ordinance, or if such power is essential to the declared objects and purposes of the municipality, then the ordinance ought to be sustained.

The power to do a particular thing may be, and often is, delegated to a municipal corporation in general terms, and these general terms may be quite as broad and comprehensive as if expressed in specific language. In the case 12 L. R. A.

before us, the city charter confers upon the City power to make regulations for the prevention of accidents by fire, and to prevent, by all possible and proper means, danger or risk of injury or damages by fire arising from carelessness, negligence or otherwise. And if these expressions of the Legislature did not expressly authorize the council to establish fire limits within the City, and to prevent the erection of wooden buildings therein, such power is certainly fairly implied in what is expressed, provided the means employed are proper or necessary to prevent accidents or danger or risk of injury or damage by fire. The propriety or necessity of the methods to be pursued to accomplish the object sought was left to the discretion of the council, who are the representatives of the people themselves, and who are the sole legislative body of the corporation. The council having by its acts declared the ordinance to be a proper one, we are of the opinion that this court is not warranted in setting it aside as invalid. In fact, it is held by learned courts and text-writers that municipalities have inherent power to pass ordinances for the protection of its citizens from fire, without express legislative authority. In a recent work upon the subject of municipal police ordinances we find this language: "The power to take all measures necessary to prevent fires and their spread is of prime importance to the citizens of every community. It belongs to that class of powers exercised for self-preservation, which are inherent in every municipality, and which do not need the authorization of an express grant. Every precaution possible should be taken to prevent the destruction to property and the danger to life incident to conflagration; and for this purpose as great a degree of interference with personal rights is permitted as under any other power. Private interests are entirely subservient to the public safety." "The first preventive step taken is usually to prescribe fire limits; that is, territorial limits within which it shall be unlawful to erect certain classes of buildings. This is always permissible." "Owing to the extreme importance of such regulations, and their vital interest to the community, one would hardly think that the power of erecting fire limits in a thickly built-up district would ever be denied; still it is surprising to note that two courts have insisted that express authority must exist for such regulations. It seems that their regard for personal rights had been carried to an unwarranted extent, in view of the importance of preventing the destruction of property by fire; and, great as our regard must be for their reasoning and conclusions, the rule above enunciated seems to be the true one, and the great majority of the well-advised decisions tends to its support." Horr & Bemis, Mun. Pol. Ord. §§ 281, 282.

In the case of Wadleigh v. Gilman, 13 Me. 408, the court held that an ordinance of the city government of Bangor prohibiting the erection of wooden buildings in the city within certain limits was within the authority conferred, under authority in the charter, "to ordain and establish such acts, laws and regulations, not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the State, as shall be needful to the good order of said body politic."

In Alexander v. Greenville, 54 Miss. 659, the court held that a power "to provide for the prevention and extinguishment of fires" implies a right to establish fire limits.

In Monroe v. Hoffman, 29 La. Ann. 651, it was decided that a municipal corporation has inherent power, independent of legislative grant, to forbid the erection and compel the removal of buildings formed of combustible materials, within the densely built-up parts of a town. And in Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 575, after citing authorities sustaining the proposition that municipal corporations possess inherent power to prohibit the erection of wooden buildings within prescribed limits, and to cause their removal, at page 580, the court says: "These cases rest on solid principle; for the rule has always been that a municipal corporation has inherent power to enact ordinances for the protection of the property of its citizens against fire." And the court says further: "A legislative Act granting authority to take precautions against fire, and ordinances passed under such an Act authorizing the removal of wooden structures erected within forbidden limits, are little more than express declarations of the existence of powers which existed at common law, and are necessarily implied in the grant of a charter to a city." Page 581. See also 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 405. We will not now stop to notice other cases cited by counsel to the same effect, as many of them are commented on and approved in the cases already mentioned by us.

It is further contended by counsel for appellee that the ordinance is unreasonable, and therefore void for that reason if for no other. This is a proper question for the court to determine. The city council, as the legislative body of the municipality; must of necessity be vested with more or less discretion as to the reasonableness of the means necessary to effectuate lawful objects. They are in a better position than the court to judge of the best course to pursue, as well as the methods best calculated to effect desired results, and the courts should not set aside or review their acts, unless, upon their face, they are manifestly unreasonable, or based upon fraud, or passed in wanton disregard of private rights, or are in excess of the power of the council. The motives of the council cannot be inquired into, but must be presumed to have been to accomplish the natural and reasonable result of their act. We see nothing unreasonable in the ordinance, viewed in the light of all the facts before us. Its burdens, if any, are cast alike upon all persons within the limits of the district prescribed by it, and the city council had lawful authority to pass it. We cannot see that it is unduly oppressive, or that it discriminates against any particular individual, or that it was passed in a spirit of wanton disregard of proprietary rights.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the court below will be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion. So ordered.

Hoyt, J., concurs.

Scott, J.:

I concur in all that is said in regard to the power of the City of Olympia to establish fire limits, and concur in the result reached, because it appears to me the question as to the invalidity of the ordinance upon the ground of its unreasonableness is not properly before us in this case. I do not think, however, a municipality has the power, or can have it even by express legislative enactment, to grant or refuse permission at its pleasure to erect wooden buildings within a fire-limit district where the same are prohibited by the ordinance, although an attempt is made therein to except cases where the city council should see fit to grant a special permit, unless certain rules, regulations or conditions are laid down by ordinance which apply to all persons alike, and are conclusive in themselves; that it cannot exercise the arbitrary power to grant such a permission to one person and refuse it to another under like conditions and circumstances. As to whether any of the provisions of this ordinance have this effect, or might be so applied, and if so whether the entire ordinance is thereby invalidated, or rendered void only in so far as it relates to the granting of such special permits, and be otherwise valid, which would prohibit the erection of all wooden buildings within the prescribed district without exception, I desire not to express an opinion in the absence of an argument of the particular questions. Powers granted to a municipality must be reasonably and fairly exercised, and its laws made applicable to all alike. The attempted enforcement of power and the unreasonableness and injustice of ordinances whereby a different result could be brought about, or this principle violated, can be inquired into to this extent at least. There was no attempt to attack the ordinance upon this ground in the complaint, but it is alleged to be void because the boundaries of the fire-limit district as fixed therein are unreasonable, without stating the facts wherein such unreasonableness consists.

Stiles, J.:

I dissent. No objection was made upon the argument here to the discussion of the question as to the equality and fairness of sections 7-9 of the Ordinance which it was assumed was raised by paragraph 7 of the complaint, and to my mind those sections set up such a system of arbitrary control of buildings in the City of Olympia by the council as is not entitled to be termed reasonable. The establishment of fire limits means the designation of a territory within which wooden buildings must not be erected. But this ordinance, while it designates limits, and says that no wooden buildings shall be constructed therein, clearly shows by its context that that was not its real purpose. The true purpose of it was to compel every person desiring to erect a wooden building to go before the council, which retained within itself the power to say whether he should erect it or not, not according to any fixed rules of determination, under which all applicants would be treated alike, but without rules or regulations whereby favoritism, or influence, or other motives not proper to the determination of such a question, might enter into and actually determine it. If there were to be exceptions to the ordinance, the exceptions should have been declared, and regulations made under which they could have been availed of. If there was territory embraced in the ordinance within which it was not expected to enforce the ordinance, by reason of its unsettled condition, it was unreasonable to so embrace it, and the limits should not have been extended over it until such time as the conditions were proper for such extension. I concur in holding that the City of Olympia has the power to ordain fire limits implied in its charter; but I cannot agree that such an ordinance was ever contemplated by the Legislature, and therefore hold the court's action in overruling the demurrer to have been eminently right.

PLANTERS' LOAN & SAVINGS BANK.

(.....Ga.....)

- *1. Demurring generally to the plaintiff's petition is pleading to the merits. After appearance at the first term, and demurring generally at a subsequent term, it is too late to raise the question of service by motion or otherwise.
2. The omission of a prayer for process is amendable, and is waived by appearance and pleading.
3. The original petition contained enough to amend, by, and the amendment allowed was proper.
4. The petition as amended embraced a cause of action. A promissory note given by the trustees and officers of a church, and a suit thereon prosecuted to judgment against the makers, will not necessarily extinguish a debt of the church for which it was given. The question of fact whether it was given in payment, or as collateral only, remained open.
5. A church site and edifice may be sold to pay the salary of the pastor. In contemplation of law, justice is not only a cardinal, but the pontifical, virtue.
6. It is doubtful whether the Fourth Equity Rule, touching exhibits to pleadings, is applicable in its full force, since the Act of 1887, establishing uniformity in pleadings. Whether so or not, the right result of a case on its merits will not be disturbed because the record of a judgment referred to in the petition was not copied and annexed as an exhibit.
7. Where the material fact in controversy is only the existence of the debt, the judge may decree the appropriate equitable relief under the allegations of the pleadings and the admissions of the answer, upon a verdict of the jury finding in favor of the plaintiff, so much for principal and so much for interest. The decree rendered in this case that the church property be sold by the sheriff, the proceeds applied to the debt, and the surplus, if any, turned over to the trustee, was proper.

Messrs. Twigg & Verdery for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Charles Z. McCord, Leonard Phinney and Foster & Lamar for defendant in error.

Bleckley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The first thing is the question of service. If the defendants below were not before the court in a way to bind them, and if they presented that objection in due time and manner, what was done as the outcome of the proceedings would have no final result. The complaint as to service was that, although there was a subpoena annexed to the original bill, there was no copy of that subpoena served on the defendants, copies of the bill only being served. The case was returnable to the October Term, 1888. At the appearance term, the names of counsel for the defendants, as appearing in their behalf, were entered on the bench docket. On April 12, 1890, the defendants demurred to the petition, "because said petition, and the matters therein contained, in manner and form as therein stated and set forth, are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action," and on several special grounds, one of which was "because there is no copy process annexed to any of the copy petitions served upon defendants." The special demurrer was not sworn to so as to entitle it to stand or be treated as a dilatory plea, in which character it would have to be sworn to. Code, § 8456. Of course, such an averment, as a ground of special demurrer, was no more than blank paper, for no such defect as want of process, annexed to the copy petitions served on defendants, appeared upon the face of the petition or elsewhere in the record. To demur generally to a petition as presenting no cause of action is to plead to the merits of the case. Here, then, was appearance and pleading to the merits, which under the Code was a waiver of service,—a waiver which would have been effective had there been no process even to the original petition nor any service whatever. Code, § 8335. After this it was too late to raise the question of service, whether by motion or by plea, for why should the defendants invoke the judgment of the court on the cause of action by demurrer, unless they were to be bound by that judgment when rendered? The demurrer was overruled on the first day of the April Term, which was the 21st of April, 1890, "upon petitioner's properly verifying the petition and amendments." This condition was complied with on the 29th of April, and not until the previous day was any separate motion made to dismiss, because no copy process was attached to the copy petitions served upon the defendants. An additional ground of the motion then made was because the sheriff failed to serve the defendants personally with a copy of the petition. This motion was too late, as coming after pleading by general demurrer to the whole action. It follows that there was no error in treating the defendants, in all the subsequent proceedings, as properly in court.

2. We think this was true, although there was no prayer for process either in the original or amended petition, since all such defects are now amendable. Code, § 3479. And inasmuch as amendment may be made at any stage, even after verdict, amendable defects are waived by appearance and pleading.

3. The next question is as to the allowance of an amendment to the plaintiff's petition, the amendment being objected to as introducing a new cause of action, and for the further reason that the original petition contained nothing to amend by. Without going fully into the contents of either, we may state, in general terms, that the original petition, although very meagre, set up a claim to have the church property in question applied to the payment of a debt which the church owed to a former pastor for services as a clergyman. It alleged that this debt was evidenced by a promissory note executed by the trustees and officers of the church, in pursuance of a resolution passed by the church, which note had been indorsed by the payee, and that suit in favor of the plaintiff was then pending upon the note in the City Court of Augusta. An injunction was prayed for, the object of which was to prevent any disposition of the church property before the result of that suit should be reached, and to hold the title of the property in statu quo until the further order of the court, the legal title being in the Perkins Manufacturing Company and the equitable ownership in the church. The amendment amplified the statements as to the debt; alleged it to be the debt of the church; averred that the suit on the note had been litigated, had resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff; that the defendants in that suit were personally insolvent, and that the fi. fa. founded on the judgment had been returned nulla bona. It prayed that the church property be subjected to the debt as the debt of the church, and called for equitable intervention because the legal title was not vested in the church, nor in the defendants in the common-law judgment. It treated that judgment as against the officers and trustees of the church, in their personal and individual character, and not in their character of trustees and officers, the theory of the plaintiff evidently being that the note was not given in satisfaction or extinguishment of the debt which the church owed to its pastor, but only as collateral security for the same. The original petition had subverted its immediate purpose when the amendment was offered. It had kept the title to the church property in statu quo until the common-law suit had proved fruitless. But it had a further object, which was to render that property available for payment of the debt in case payment should not be realized out of the collateral note and the suit predicated thereon. The petition was therefore a foundation on which to build by amendment, in case further equitable proceedings should become necessary, and this contingency was realized when the makers of the note, at the end of legal process against them, proved insolvent. The matter of the amendment was thus proper material for a supplemental bill, and, by our Code, § 4181, could be brought in by way of amendment. We hold, therefore, that the court did not err in allowing the amendment.

4. The amendment which we have discussed was filed on the 18th of April, 1899, nearly one year before the demurrer was interposed. Did the petition, as amended, present a cause of action? The parties before the court were the Bank (the indorsee of the note given by the officers and trustees of the church) as plaintiff, and the church, represented by the trustees, the Perkins Manufacturing Company, together with the indorser, the original payee of the note, as defendants. Thus all the parties interested in the original contract between the church and its pastor, and in the ownership of the note which grew out of that contract, were represented. If that note was given and taken, not in extinguishment of the church debt, but merely as collateral, neither the note itself nor the suit and judgment thereon in the city court would operate as a discharge of the debt. Wyllie v. Collins, 9 Ga. 224.

The petition treats the debt as still subsisting, and as one to be paid by the church, now that the collateral security has been prosecuted to a return of nulla bona. This security is both legally and equitably the property of the Bank, the Bank having purchased it for value. Such being the case, the Bank has the equitable ownership of the debt owing by the church, the collection of which out of the church property is the ultimate object of this action. The question of fact whether the note was given in discharge of that debt or only as collateral security for it would be for determination by a jury, and that question, we may assume, was properly submitted to the jury on the trial which finally took place.

5. Treating the debt as unpaid, can the church edifice and the premises on which it stands, the same being a city lot in the City of Augusta, be subjected by a court of equity, or rather by a court of law exercising equitable powers, to its payment? The church, as an organization, is the Antioch Baptist Church, and the equitable ownership of the property is in it, or in the trustees, which represent it in this action. The formal legal title is outstanding in the Perkins Manufacturing Company, which once had claims upon the premises as security for a debt now satisfied. Here, then, is a debtor having some property, perhaps sufficient property to discharge the debt. Why should it not be so applied? If any debt ought to be paid, it is one contracted for the health of souls,—for pious ministrations and holy services. If any class of debtors ought to pay, as matter of moral as well as legal duty, the good people of a Christian church are that class. No church can have any higher obligation resting upon it than that of being just. The study of justice for more than forty years has impressed me with the supreme importance of this grand and noble virtue. Some of the virtues are in the nature of moral luxuries, but this is an absolute necessary of social life. It is the hog and hominy, the bacon and beans of morality, public and private. It is the exact virtue, being mathematical in its nature. Mercy, pity, charity, gratitude, generosity, magnanimity, etc., are the liberal virtues. They flourish partly in voluntary concessions made by the exact virtue, but they have no right to extort from it any unwilling concession. They can only supplicate or persuade. A man cannot give in charity or from pity, hospitality or magnanimity, the smallest part of what is necessary to enable him to satisfy the demands of justice. It is ignoble to indulge any of the liberal virtues by leaving undischarged any of these imperative demands against us. On the credit side of justice we can make any sacrifice of it that we will, but on the debit side we can make none whatever. I may burn as an offering my own bull or lamb, but not that which rightfully belongs to another owner. There is nothing more exalted than a strict duty and its performance. What we freely give cannot be better bestowed than what we pay in discharge of a perfect obligation. The law grants exemptions of property to families, but none to private corporations or collective bodies, lay or ecclesiastical. These must pay their debts if they can. All their property, legal and equitable, is subject. Atlanta v. Grant, 57 Ga. 846.

We think a court may well constrain this church to do justice. In contemplation of law, justice is not only one of the cardinal virtues, it is the pontifical virtue. Certainly it is an energetic measure to sell the church to pay the preacher; nor would it be allowable to do so if other means of satisfying the debt were within reach. But the plain implication from the facts alleged is that the church has no assets other than this property, and, on looking into the answer, we find that the answer makes no suggestion of any other assets.

6. Touching that ground of the demurrer which points out specially that the plaintiff has failed to annex to the petition a copy of the record upon which the common-law judgment therein referred to is founded, we need say but little. It is doubtful whether, since the Act of 1867 for uniformity of pleading in the superior court, the strict equity rule for attaching exhibits any longer applies. As to how that rule, while in force, was applied, see Demers v. Soranton, 8 Ga. 48; Hollday v. Riondon, 12 Ga. 417; Groce v. Field, 18 Ga. 24; Brown v. Rodney, 16 Ga. 67; Miller v. Saunders, 18 Ga. 493; Behn v. Young, 21 Ga. 207; Howard Mfg. Co. v. Water-Lot Co. 39 Ga. 574, 58 Ga. 689; Patterson v. Turner, 62 Ga. 874; Graham v. Dahlonaga G. Min. Co. 71 Ga. 296; Millbank v. Penniman, 78 Ga. 186.

It may be observed that the Fourth Equity Rule, as it stands in the Code (page 1854), seems to omit the word "other" in the second line, as will appear from a copy of the Seventeenth Equity Rule in 2 Ga. 484. It may be that, under the new Act, there ought to be some degree of conformity to the rule in pleading all material records and documents referred to in the petition. But where a case has had a right result in the court below on the merits, we do not feel called upon to reverse the judgment simply because that court may have been too liberal to one of the parties in dispensing with the formality of annexing exhibits to the pleadings. There is no probability that the defendants were unacquainted with the contents of the record in the common-law case, or that they suffered any substantial injury or disadvantage in the omission to set it out as an exhibit.

7. The verdict of the jury was as follows: "We, the jury, find verdict for plaintiff, principal $278.75, interest $97.60." On this verdict the court entered up a decree to the effect that the debt is that of the Antioch Baptist Church; that the property is subject thereto; that the debt be a lien upon it; that the sheriff levy upon it, under and by virtue of the decree, expose it for sale according to law, and execute title to the purchaser; that out of the proceeds of the sale the debt and all costs be discharged, and that the overplus, if any, be paid over to the trustees of the church; also that the defendants be perpetually restrained and enjoined from disturbing or in any way interfering with the title of said property, or the sale thereof, until the debt and costs be paid off and discharged. This decree is excepted to as going beyond the verdict, and as being unwarranted thereby in the light of the pleadings. On looking into the answer, we find that it raised but one material issue, the other material facts being expressly or by fair implication admitted. The answer insisted that the note on which the judgment at law was recovered was given and received in full satisfaction and extinguishment of the debt due from the church to the pastor for his services, and that the note was executed by the makers as individuals, and not as officers of the church; also that they were sued as individuals, and judgment recovered against them accordingly. The jury having found in favor of the plaintiff, they must necessarily have determined that the note was not given in extinguishment of the debt. This was enough to warrant the court in decreeing appropriate relief, adapted to the allegations of the petition and the admissions of the answer. We fail to perceive that the relief awarded was inappropriate or otherwise illegal. The decree devotes the property to the payment of the debt, by judicial sale through the sheriff, and directs the surplus proceeds, if any, to be paid over to the trustees of the church. We think the decree, as a whole, was a proper one.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Bibb County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. M. Wimberly and Bacon & Rutherford for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Depau & Bartlett and R. W. Patterson for defendant in error.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Maria E. Shivers, by a deed dated December 18, 1862, in consideration of $2,000, conveyed certain land to Charles H. Baird, trustee for Josephine Baird and her children, "to have and to hold . . . to the only proper use, benefit and behoof of him, the said Charles H. Baird, in special trust for the sole and separate use of Josephine Baird and her children, his heirs, executors, etc., in fee simple." At the time this deed was executed no children had ever been born to Mrs. Baird, but since then she has become the mother of several children. This case was submitted to the judge below upon a construction of this instrument, the question being whether or not these children of Mrs. Baird, born after the execution of the deed, took any interest thereunder in the property. The court below held that they did not, and in accordance with this opinion directed a verdict for the defendant. It is conceded that, if the court's construction of the deed was right, the verdict was proper; otherwise it was not. We are of the opinion that the ruling of the court was correct. This court has already decided, in the case of Lofton v. Murchison, 80 Ga. 391, that "a will, made and probated in the year 1847, by which the testator devised to his daughter certain land, 'to her and her children, free from the disposition of any future husband' (the daughter then having no children), conveyed to her an absolute fee; and children born to her after the testator's death took no estate under the will by way of remainder or otherwise."

The case of Wiley v. Smith, 3 Ga. 551, was one where a testator devised property to his executors, in trust for his son, William Brantley, and his children (William at the time having no children) with devise over to the heirs named in his will upon William dying without having a child or children; and it was held that William took an estate tail, with remainder to the heirs named in the will, and this, of course, under our Statute, made a fee simple in William, the first taker. A devise to "A's children, their heirs and assigns forever," vests the title to those in esse at the death of the testator. Wood v. McGuire, 15 Ga. 208.

Upon a deed conveying land to Mills, trustee for Mrs. Mills and her children in fee simple, it was held that Mrs. Mills and her children then in life took the land as tenants in common, and that it did not go to her during her life, with remainder to her children. Loyless v. Blackshear, 48 Ga. 327.

Where a deed was made by A, conveying property to the heirs of B (the latter then having three children in esse), the title passed to those three children, and after-born children of B took no interest. Tharp v. Yarbrough, 79 Ga. 382.

one in which a deed from Gazaway B. Lamar conveyed property to G. de Rosset Lamar, in trust for himself and his three sisters (naming them), the portions of the sisters to be settled upon them, so as not to be responsible for the debts of any husband they might have, "but for the sole use, benefit and advantage of each of these sisters and their child or children." At the date of this deed one of the sisters had one child, and the others had none. In that case the precise point ruled was that the child in existence when the deed was made took an interest, as tenant in common, with his mother; but Chief Justice Bleckley also remarked that "the daughters who had no child or children took an estate severally to themselves in fee simple." While this remark was obiter, it shows the bent of the court's mind at the time, and is now adopted as sound law. The head note in that case is manifestly incorrect, as even a casual reading of the case will show. In addition to what it contains, it should also be made to recite that the conveyance was to G. de Rosset Lamar, in trust for himself and his three sisters, and, as to the latter for the sole use, etc., "of them and their child or children." In Wild's Case, 6 Coke, 17, the second head note is as follows: "A devise to B, and to his children or issues, B having no issue at the time of the devise, is an estate tail; otherwise when he has issue at the time;" and these comments are made thereon: "And therefore this difference was resolved for good law: that if A devise his lands to B and to his children or issues, and he hath not any issue at the time of the devise, that the same is an estate tail; for the intent of the deviser is manifest and certain that his children or issues should take, and as immediate devisees they cannot take, because they are not in rerum natura, and by way of remainder they cannot take, for that was not his intent, for the gift is immediate, therefore there such words shall be taken as words of limitation, scilicet, as much as children or issues of his body, for every child or issue ought to be of the body; and therewith agrees a case, Trin. 4 Eliz., reported by Sergeant Bendloes, where the case was that one devised land to husband and wife, 'and to the men children of their bodies begotten,' and it did not appear in the case that they had any issue male at the time of the devise; and therefore it was adjudged that they had an estate tail to them and the heirs males of their bodies; but if a man devises land to A. and to his children or issue, and they then have issue of their bodies, there his express intent may take effect, according to the rule of the common law, and no manifest and certain intent appears in the will to the contrary." Following Wild's Case, and citing it as authority, is the case of Byng v. Byng, 10 H. L. Cas. 170, where it was held that "when there is a devise of land to A and his children, and at the time of the devise he has no child, the word 'children' is prima facie a word of limitation, and the first taker shall have an estate tail." In this case concurring opinions were delivered by Lord Chancellor Westbury and Lords Cranworth and Kingsdown, all upholding the rule in Wild's Case, and reaffirming the doctrine therein stated, as expressed above. See also Sweetapple v. Emdon, 2 Vern. 536.

The learned counsel who so ably argued this case for the plaintiff in error undertook to take it out of the rule in Wild's Case on three grounds: (1) because the instrument now under consideration is a deed, and not a will, and for this reason a different rule of construction should be applied; (2) because in the deed from Mrs. Shivers a trustee is appointed, and the conveyance made to him, instead of Mrs. Baird and her children directly, whereby the estate might be preserved till children should be born; and (3) because, as he argued, it was a reasonable inference, from the terms of the deed itself, that the maker intended to include in its benefits the after-born children of Mrs. Baird. Taking these propositions in their order, we will first discuss whether or not it makes any difference that the paper in question is a deed instead of a will. Under our system we do not think this fact should vary the rule of construction. In the several chapters of our Code relating to the creation of estates, it seems immaterial whether those estates are made by will or by deed. I refer especially to section 2250, which treats of gifts or grants such as would, under the common law, create estates tail, without making any distinction as to whether such estates are created by deed or will. It is true that the deed before us was made a short time before the Code went into effect, but our understanding is that many of the various sections of the Code in the chapters above referred to simply embody the spirit of our law as it was understood and enforced before the adoption of the Code. In support of this I quote from the opinion of Chief Justice Lumpkin in Skumate v. Williams, 84 Ga. 249: "The presumption is a fair one that the Code correctly renders the substance of all statutes then [that is, at the time of its adoption] in force, except where modification plainly appears. It would be making a too limited use of this great book to consult it only for the present state of the law, overlooking the fact that, while it introduces numerous changes, it is mainly a declaratory exposition, in a concise and systematic form, of the body of laws, common and statute, which the codifiers found already established. One of its prime objects was to clear up obscurities and resolve doubts. It speaks to us of the past, as well as of the present and future; not, it is true, in the same imperative voice, but with that mitigated authority which belongs to legislative interpretation, led and directed, in this instance, by the professional ability both of the codifiers themselves and of the committee of lawyers who, after scrutinizing their work, approved and recommended its adoption." Another view of this question may be submitted. Children and grandchildren being the natural objects of a testator's affections, it is to be supposed that in the making of his will he usually bears them in mind, and desires them to share in and enjoy his bounty. This is manifest from the large number of wills providing, in one way and another, for the testator's descendants. Deeds are contracts, in the making of which both contracting parties are supposed to take care of themselves; and where a grantee intends to contract for the benefit of his children as well as of himself, having the same natural desire in their behalf as in case of a testator making a will, and being a party to the instrument, he has the opportunity to secure the end desired by having the deed speak its real purpose plainly and unmistakably. It would seem, then, that no rule more favorable to the interests of children ought to be allowed in the one case than in the other. We have seen what construction has been uniformly put upon wills containing language like that in the deed before us; and, on general principles, we can see no good reason why such deeds should not be similarly treated. Indeed, it will be observed that in several of the cases above cited the instruments construed were deeds, and yet no distinction was made in any of them because the paper under consideration was a deed, and not a will. In the second place, we do not see that the interposition of a trustee should change the rule. In the cases above cited from 8 Ga., 43 Ga., and 82 Ga., the titles were put in trustees. The instruments construed in all these cases were made prior to the passage of the Act of 1866, known as the "Woman's Law," by which the property of married women was vested in them as their separate estates. In the case cited from 43 Ga. it is fair to presume, and in that cited from 82 Ga. it plainly appears, that the conveyance of the property to a trustee was for the purpose of protecting it from the marital rights of the husband. The deed now under consideration was made in 1862, and it is quite as reasonable to conclude that the conveyance was made to a trustee in order to protect the property from the marital rights of Mrs. Baird's husband, as that this was done to preserve the estate for the benefit of children yet to be born; and, this being true, the presence of the trustee in the deed may as well be accounted for upon the one theory as the other. As Chief Justice Bleckley remarked, discussing another question, in the case above cited from 80 Ga.: "When a third thing is equally compatible with either of two others it affords no reason for inferring one of the two rather than the other." Hence, we conclude that a deed of this kind should be treated and construed exactly as if no trustee had been interposed, and the decisions of this court to which we have above referred seem to justify this conclusion. In the last place, in reference to the well-settled doctrine that all rules of construction should yield to the manifest intention of the maker, this should only be done when such intention may be plainly and easily gathered from the instrument itself. An examination of the cases in which the courts have sought to follow the intention of the maker of an instrument, without resorting to rules of construction, will show that in almost every instance there were superadded words which plainly indicated what the intention was.

In the case of Toole v. Perry, 80 Ga. 681, cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error, it was held that a devise to the testator's daughters and their children would not only include children in life at the death of the testator, but also others born after his death by the daughter's first husband, and others still by a second husband, whom she married after the testator's death. But Justice Blandford, in delivering the opinion, said distinctly that this conclusion was reached by the court because from the language used in the will itself it must have been the intention of the testator to include all the children of his daughters, no matter when they might be born; and this statement is based upon the fact that in this particular will the testator referred to the present or any future husbands of his daughters, and declared that the husbands of those under coverture when the will took effect should be the trustees, respectively, of the portions given to their wives and children.

In the cases of Brady v. Walters, 55 Ga. 25, and Boyd v. England, 56 Ga. 598, the deeds contained the words, "children born and to be born," and, of course, in these cases the intention was clear, because it was plainly expressed. So in Chess Carley Co. v. Purtell, 74 Ga. 487, this court held that the words "her present heirs" manifestly meant the children of Mrs. Purtell then living, and ruled the case on the idea that the intention was plain. In the deed from Mrs. Shivers there were no super-added words or other expressions to take the case out of the rule in Wild's Case. It is simply a plain deed, in the usual form of such deeds, and no more, with nothing in the context outside of the conveying clauses to aid in arriving at the intention of the paper. We think it has been clearly shown that if this paper was a will there would be no question at all as to the propriety of applying the rule stated; and, as we have undertaken to show that the same rule should be applied to both wills and deeds, it follows that the children of Mrs. Baird, born subsequently to the execution of this deed, could take nothing thereunder, but the fee was absolutely vested in the first taker.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Edith L. HOWARD
v.
CITY OF WORCESTER.

(.....Mass.....)

Negligence in blasting for the construction of a schoolhouse, the work being purely for the benefit of the public, cannot create any liability against a city, unless by force of some statute.

(April 1, 1891.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Worcester County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligence of defendant's servant, in which a verdict was rendered in plaintiff's favor. Sustained.

Plaintiff was traveling upon a highway in defendant City when her horse was frightened by blasting performed under the direction of one Kenney in excavating for the foundations of a public school building. The trial court refused to direct a verdict for defendant, but submitted the case to the jury, who found for plaintiff, and defendant alleged exceptions.

Mr. Frank P. Goulding, for defendant:

The case is within the principle of—

Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344; Tindley v. Salem, 187 Mass. 171; Fisher v. Boston, 104 Mass. 87; Hafford v. New Bedford, 16 Gray, 297; Mower v. Leicester, 9 Mass. 247; White v. Phillipston, 10 Met. 108, 110; Bigelow v. Randolph, 14 Gray, 541; Doherty v. Braintree, 148 Mass. 495; Benton v. Boston City Hospital, 140 Mass. 18; Prince v. Lynn, 149 Mass. 193; Clark v. Waltham, 128 Mass. 567.

A town is not liable for the negligence of its agents or servants in a matter in which it has no interest, and which has no direct or natural tendency to injure any individual in person or property, and which it has in charge solely in the performance of a public duty imposed upon it by law.

Neff v. Wellesley, 2 L. R. A. 500, 148 Mass. 487, 493.

Messrs. F. A. Gaskill and Blackmer & Vaughan, for plaintiff:

Chief Justice Gray, in Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 358, very clearly illustrates the limit of the exemption of cities from liability for injuries to individuals: "In such cases, the cause of action is not neglect in the performance of a corporate duty, rendering a public work unfit for the purposes for which it was intended, but it is the doing of a wrongful act, causing a direct injury to the property of another, outside of the limits of the public work."

The use of explosives, dangerous in themselves and liable to escape from the premises, used so near the highway, "had a direct tendency to injure the person or property of another." The City knew that such means were to be used.

At their peril they must keep the dangerous substance or its results from escaping and injuring others.

Deane v. Randolph, 132 Mass. 475; Tindley v. Salem, 187 Mass. 171; Waldron v. Haverhill, 3 New Eng. Rep. 683, 143 Mass. 582.

C. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The City contends that, even assuming that Kenney was its servant in such a sense that ordinarily it might be responsible for his acts or negligence, it is nevertheless exempt from responsibility to the plaintiff in the present case by reason of the nature of the work which it was carrying on, namely, the construction of a schoolhouse for public use. It was held in the familiar case of Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, that a city is not responsible in damages to a child attending a public school in a schoolhouse provided by the city, under the duty imposed upon it by general laws for an injury sustained by the child by reason of the unsafe condition of a staircase in the building.

In Bigelow v. Randolph, 14 Gray, 541, a similar doctrine was applied where a scholar received an injury from a dangerous excavation in the schoolhouse yard. The doctrine was reiterated in Sullivan v. Boston, 126 Mass. 540. It has also been applied to other public grounds, like Boston Common. Steele v. Boston, 128 Mass. 588; Veale v. Boston, 135 Mass. 187; Clark v. Waltham, 128 Mass. 567; Oliver v. Worcester, 103 Mass. 489.

On the same principle a city was declared to be exempt from responsibility for a personal injury received in consequence of the defective condition of a public hospital. Benton v. Boston City Hospital, 140 Mass. 18. In other States a similar rule of exemption has been adopted in reference to schoolhouses and other public buildings maintained solely for public use and service. Wixon v. Newport, 18 R. I. 454 (schoolhouse); Eastman v. Meredith, 36 N. H. 284 (town-house); Hamilton County v. Mighels, 7 Ohio St. 109 (court-house); Board of Chosen Freeholders of Sussex County v. Strader, 18 N. J. L. 108, 121 (dictum of Hornblower, Ch. J., as to court-houses and jails).

The principle on which this exemption from responsibility rests is that in the various instances referred to the building was erected, or the grounds were prepared, solely for the public use, and with a sole view to the general benefit, and under the requirement or authority of general laws. In such cases, in the absence of any statute which directly or by implication gives a private remedy, no action lies in favor of a person who has received an injury in consequence of a negligent or defective performance of the public service. The cases heretofore cited relate to injuries received after the completion of the work. It makes no difference, however, if the injury is caused by a negligent act done in the direct performance of the service. Tindley v. Salem, 187 Mass. 171; Lincoln v. Boston, 148 Mass. 578, 8 L. R. A. 257; Fisher v. Boston, 104 Mass. 87; Hafford v. New Bedford, 16 Gray, 297.

The plaintiff seeks to establish a distinction on the ground that her injury was received outside of the limits of the public work, relying on an expression in the judgment in Hill v. Boston, above cited, at page 858, and on the various decisions where cities and towns have been held responsible for injuries caused by or in the course of the construction of roads and bridges, by blasting rocks, setting back water, etc.; for example, Deane v. Randolph, 183 Mass. 475; Lawrence v. Fairhaven, 6 Gray, 110; Waldron v. Haverhill, 148 Mass. 589, 3 New Eng. Rep. 688. Those cases, however, rest on grounds which take them out of the general rule, and in the last resort it must probably be considered that, taking all the statutes together which relate to the construction of roads and bridges, it is to be inferred that the Legislature intended to recognize the existence of a liability for the consequences of negligence in the performance of the work. In the present case, the service in which the City was engaged was purely for the benefit of the public, and we think the case falls within the general rule which exonerates it from responsibility for the consequences of its servant's negligence. The servant himself may be responsible. The City is exempt. See also Neff v. Wellesley, 148 Mass. 487, 2 L. R. A. 500; Curran v. Boston, 151 Mass. 505, 8 L. R. A. 248; Bates v. Westborough, 151 Mass. 174, 7 L. R. A. 156.

evidence of any kind to support them, and can be accounted for on no reasonable hypothesis. They have no foundation in reality, and spring from a diseased or morbid condition of the mind.

2. Where a person persistently believes supposed facts which have no real existence except in his perverted imagination, and against all evidence and probability, and conducts himself, however logically, upon the assumption of their existence, he is, so far as they

NOTE.—Testamentary capacity as affected by an insane delusion; delusion defined.

If at the time a testator makes his will he is laboring under an insane delusion, either in regard to his property or the natural and proper objects of his bounty, which affects the disposition which he makes, or of which delusion the papers are the offspring or fruit, he is without testamentary capacity. Notes to Elkinton v. Brick (N. J.), 1 L. R. A. 161.

The definition of "insane delusion" given in the principal case is the one almost universally acted upon, although some slight modifications of it appear in some cases and an occasional criticism. See Smith v. Tebbitt, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 401; Boughton v. Knight, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 64. 12 L. R. A.

There must be a belief of facts, which no rational person would have believed, which in fact have no basis in reason and the belief in which neither reason nor evidence can expel. Mere mistake of fact is not sufficient, nor is a mistaken belief based on false statements. See Middleditch v. Williams, 4 L. R. A. 738, and note, 45 N. J. Eq. 728; Schouler, Wills, § 146; Clapp v. Fullerton, 34 N. Y. 197; Stackhouse v. Horton, 15 N. J. Eq. 228 (citing Greenwood's Case, as stated in White v. Wilson, 13 Ves. Jr. 89); Merrill v. Rolston, 5 Redf. 251; American Seamen's Friend Soc. v. Hopper, 33 N. Y. 619.

The delusion must point to actual unsoundness of mind: it must be an insane delusion (Brown v. Ward, 58 Md. 322); something more must be shown than simply a mistaken notion on the part of the are concerned, under a morbid delusion, and delusion in that sense is insanity. But where the belief or aversion to the contestant was formed on an apparent cause, leading on his part to a view unjust and erroneous, this only shows an unfortunate error of judgment or a want of reasoning power, but not an absolute want of intellect on the subject. It shows a bad judgment upon an insufficient state of facts, but not that his conclusion was formed without any foundation in fact, apparent or otherwise.

3. It is not enough that a delusion may exist, but its connection with the testator's will must be made manifest and shown to have influenced its provisions before the will can be set aside and declared void.
4. Where it was claimed that the testator was the subject of an insane delusion, but admitted to be of sound mind on all other subjects not connected with such delusion, but which delusion, the evidence disclosed,—assuming such delusion to have ever existed,—was not present influencing him when he executed the will,—Held, that the will was valid.
5. While it seems harsh and cruel that a parent should disinherit one of his children and devise his property to others, or cut them all off and devise it to strangers, from some unworthy motive, yet as long as that motive, whether from pride or aversion, spite or prejudice, is not resolvable into mental perversion, no court can interfere.
6. It is enough that the law recognizes the right of the parent to make such testamentary disposition of his property as he chooses to select as the subject of his bounty, and in the exercise of this right he may have reasons satisfactory to himself why some of his children should enjoy his estate while others are excluded. Some may be more deserving than others,—more needful of help, for various reasons; some may have contributed largely to its acquisition. These and other reasons may exert an influence in favor of some and in exclusion of others.

(January 6, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Clackamas County affirming a judgment of the County Court which set aside the probate of the will of Cyrus W. Jones, deceased, and adjudged it to be null and void. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.
Messrs. C. D. Latourette, D. C. Latourette and W. Casey Johnson for appellee.
Messrs. Stewart & Jones for respondent.

Lord, J., delivered the opinion of the court: This was a proceeding instituted in the County Court of Clackamas County by the contestant to have the order admitting to probate the will of her father, Cyrus W. Jones, deceased, vacated and annulled, and the will set aside and declared void. The will was executed on the 19th day of January, 1887, and the testator died on the 20th day of August, 1887, leaving several children, to whom he devised his property, with the sole exception of the contestant, who was excluded from its bounty. The proceeding resulted in a decree vacating the order, and setting aside the will as void, which was affirmed on appeal by a decree of the circuit court, and from which this appeal is taken. The theory upon which the will is alleged to be void is that the testator, though conceded to be of sound mind upon all other subjects, was laboring under a delusion in relation to the legitimacy of his daughter, the contestant, causing him to entertain a violent hatred or insane aversion towards her, which rendered him wholly incapable of doing any legal act in which her interest was involved, and which so affected and influenced him at the time of the execution of his will as caused him to deprive her of all benefit in his estate. The record discloses that the testator was married to his wife on the 10th day of May, 1835, in the State of Ohio; that a few years thereafter they emigrated to Missouri, where they continued to reside until 1861, when they emigrated to Oregon, having at this time a family of ten children, and settled in Marion County, on what is commonly known as "Mission Bottom." Here they continued to reside until 1865, when they started on a return trip to Missouri, taking with them two of their boys and three of their girls, one of testator as to the feelings or intentions of his relatives in reference to him or his property. Hall v. Hall, 38 Ala. 134.

Further, the delusion must enter into and influence the testator's action in making the dispositions of his property complained of. Dew v. Clark, 3 Add. Ecol. 72; Re Cole's Will, 49 Wis. 123; Cotton v. Ulmer, 45 Ala. 373; Robinson v. Adams, 62 Me. 400; Benoit v. Murrin, 58 Mo. 324; Boyd v. Eby, 3 Watts, 71; Rice v. Rice, 50 Mich. 455.

So a will may be sustained although the testator may be shown to have been subject to insane delusions on certain subjects, for the existence of delusion on one subject is not inconsistent with sufficient soundness of mind on another. Shaver v. McCarthy, 1 Cent. Rep. 142, 110 Pa. 339; note to Kerr v. Lunsford (W. Va.) 3 L. R. A. 608.

Although a testator at the time of executing his will may harbor insane delusions, yet if he has mind enough to know and appreciate his relations to the natural objects of his bounty and the character and effect of the dispositions of his will, he has a mind sufficiently strong to enable him to make a valid will. Dunham's App. 27 Conn. 203. See also James v. Langdon, 7 B. Mon. 196; Boardman v. Woodman, 47 N. H. 120.

This doctrine is not uniform. Some cases have held that an insane delusion on one subject was sufficient evidence of lack of testamentary capacity to avoid a will made by one shown to have been subject to such delusion, whether it appeared to have influenced the particular dispositions of property complained of or not. See Waring v. Waring, 6 Moore, P. C. 349; Smith v. Tebbitt, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 393.

These cases, however, have not received the approval of either the English or American courts, and the opposite doctrine has prevailed. Consequently an insane delusion on such subjects as witchcraft, spiritualism or spectral or supernatural influences of any kind will rarely justify the setting aside of the will of one entertaining such delusion. Note to Middleditch v. Williams (N. J.) 4 L. R. A. 738; Re Bonard's Will, 16 Abb. Pr. 134; Addington v. Wilson, 5 Ind. 139.

But where such delusion directly affects the provisions of the will, diverting the estate from its just and natural course and devoting it to purposes which no rational man would countenance or support, it may be sufficient to destroy the will. See Schouler, Wills, § 163.

whom is the contestant, and going by the way of California, where they stopped for a short time and where the two boys concluded to remain. The parents with these three daughters went on to Missouri, and after their arrival there his wife and the contestant of their own choice left him and went to Ohio, where they remained and never lived afterwards with him. The testator returned to Oregon in 1867 with the other two girls. He bought another farm in Marion County, where he resided for a few years, and then purchased the farm in Clackamas County to which he moved, and where he was living when the will was executed and until his death. In 1872 he obtained a decree of divorce from his wife on the ground of desertion and cruel treatment. The evidence shows that the testator was a man of sensitive disposition and of a nervous and jealous temperament; that early after his marriage, and especially while he and his wife resided in Missouri, he became suspicious of her chastity, and entertained the belief that she was intimate with a man who met her near a certain spring for adulterous purposes, and that two of the children—the contestant and Calvin Jones—were the offspring of such adulterous embraces. He also expressed the belief that another person in Oregon, while they lived together here, was on intimate terms with her, and at one time sought to chastise him for his supposed conduct. This belief, however, in the infidelity of his wife and the illegitimacy of two of his children was not proclaimed from the housetop, or to everyone; but with few exceptions, and those intimate friends, it was only communicated to his brothers. His daughters who lived with him are now married, and never seem to have heard of the matter or knew he entertained such a belief until the commencement of this suit. They knew that there was an estrangement between their parents and that they did not live happily together, but they never supposed the cause of it was due to any morbid delusion involving the chastity of their mother or the illegitimacy of any of the children. To avoid prolixity, we shall say our conviction from the evidence is that his wife was a chaste woman and faithful to her marriage vows, and that the two children named were not the spurious product of her adulterous embraces with another man; but the fact remains, according to the testimony of those to whom he confided his domestic troubles, that he always furnished some grounds for his belief. He identified the party and the place, and described the clandestine manner in which their improper meeting was effected. That such things could occur, or have occurred under less probable circumstances, will not be denied; they are only rendered improbable in the present instance by the absolute confidence expressed in her marital fidelity by her acquaintances. While, therefore, we shall regard this suspicion or belief of her infidelity to her marriage bed with its attendant circumstances as unjust and unworthy of belief, we cannot disregard the fact that there was the opportunity for the parties to have met at the spring, and that it might have occurred in reality for perfectly proper and innocent purposes or without evil design or any concert of action; yet to a man of the testator's sensitive and jealous disposition a trifling circumstance of this kind or a slightly imprudent act would incite his distrust and fill him with jealous suspicions. Whether there were any such visits to the spring near his residence, surreptitious or otherwise, by his wife and the suspected party while they lived in Missouri, there is nothing shown by the evidence, except his declarations, to the persons already referred to, that he had often seen such party go to the spring, when his wife would don her bonnet and go clandestinely to the same place. The evidence of those whose testimony leads to the conviction that his suspicions or accusations were unjust and unfounded rests, not upon any knowledge of the facts one way or the other, but on their knowledge of her character and confidence in her chastity as inconsistent with such conduct. Mr. Sampson Jones and his wife, people of excellent character, and whose testimony is entitled to credit, to whom the testator perhaps talked and gave vent to his insinuations and suspicions with more freedom than any others, regarded his accusations of unchastity as unjust and untrue, and the circumstances which gave rise to them as too inconsistent with her character to be worthy of belief, and express the opinion that she was faithful to her marriage vows and the duties of a wife, and that in view of his conduct the testator was laboring under a delusion upon this matter. Stress and importance have been given to this phase of the case and the evidence, as it is the main starting point of his domestic woes and infelicities, of his suspicions of his wife's infidelity and the illegitimacy of his two children,—the contestant and her brother Calvin Jones. It is true that while they lived in Missouri and in Oregon between 1861 and 1865 their married lives were embittered by estrangements. Much of the time they refused to speak with each other or to conduct themselves in any way calculated to resume confidence and affection; and it was doubtless during some such period, when the cup of their domestic unhappiness was overflowing, that the testator was disposed to give vent to his feelings and indulge in unjust accusations against his wife's chastity in the manner described by some of his relatives. It was about this time, when the testator and his wife were estranged and not on speaking terms, although living together as husband and wife, that the conversation with Northcutt took place, in which that witness represents him as inveighing with great temper and acrimony against his wife's marital infidelity. There is no doubt that he was extremely jealous of his wife, and entertained a strong suspicion, if not conviction, of her infidelity and his own dishonor. But this was the time when their domestic troubles were hastening to a culmination which finally ended in separation. When they arrived in Missouri after leaving this State in 1865, Mrs. Wright, one of the daughters, gives an account of the separation of the testator and her mother. She heard her mother say to her father: "You have brought me here with the intention of leaving me here;" and father said: "No, I did not; if you want to go to Oregon with us you can;" and that her mother said she was going to Ohio; that as to the children "he gave us the choice to stay or go with him; that mother left us and went to Ohio with Libby Potter [the contestant] and shortly after that we started for Oregon."

Mrs. White, the other daughter, testified to the same, substantially. The contestant remembered "that her mother and father had a conversation after they went back to Missouri about separating." She does not know the cause of it, except she thought they were in bad humor; nor had she ever heard of any insane delusion or insanity on the part of her father until after his death, and heard that from her attorneys; nor does she remember that she ever heard her mother say anything about it. She remembers that her father was not given to caressing his children,—never caressed her nor repulsed her. Thinks she disliked her father at the time her mother left him, and remembers that she preferred to go with her mother when she left her father in Missouri and went back to Ohio; that she slept with her mother and father on the trip at the foot of the bed; that he never whipped or abused her; that she saw him whip one of the children; that her father gave her mother some money when they left for Ohio, but does not think it exceeded $300; that her mother received notice of the divorce proceedings in Oregon while she was living in Ohio; that neither her mother nor the contestant ever lived with their father afterwards; that she is married and has two children, is in good circumstances, and resides in Missouri. The evidence shows that the testator and his other two daughters returned to Oregon, and finally settled in Clackamas County, and lived there until his death, in 1887. The subscribing witnesses to the execution of the will were old acquaintances living in the neighborhood, who had traded with him, hunted and traveled together, had visited at his house, attended school-meetings together, met at the stores and other places, and they concur in the opinion that his mind was sound and free from all disturbing influences when he executed his will; that he mentioned the portions to be given to each of the children, and betrayed no bad humor, or anything to indicate that he was not rational; that he understood his business and the property he possessed and how he wished to have it distributed. His physicians, who had known him for years and who attended him, also express the opinion that he was rational, knew what he was doing and how he was doing it, and that he was competent at the time to execute a will, and that it was the product of his own free agency. They did not interrogate him in respect to his family matters. They never had had any conversation with him on this subject, and perhaps knew nothing about it, and only think from what they saw and observed that his mind was free from any disturbing influences, and that when he executed his will he knew and understood what he was doing. The evidence also shows that during the last twenty years—from the time he returned to Oregon until his death—he acquired property, was industrious and frugal, was a man of good judgment and business sagacity, attended to his own affairs, dealt extensively with numerous persons, took a proper interest in neighborhood matters, lived to a ripe old age,—past threescore and ten,—and, with the children about him who had chosen to remain with him, made his will giving his property to them. His reasons for disposing of his property in the manner he did and of excluding the contestant from his bounty are, taking the statement of the witnesses together for brevity, that he had given to the contestant and her mother the shares to which they were entitled when they separated; that he understood his daughter (the contestant) was married and had a good home; that he told the children that all of them that wished to remain with him could do so, and that they did so except the contestant, but that he said nothing about her illegitimacy; that he had made up his mind that those who had remained with him and helped to earn it ought to have the benefit of it. Referring to the fact that he wished to will to his wife and the contestant one dollar, as he did when the will was executed, he was asked, "Why do you intend to make your will in that way?" and he said: "The reason is very simple. When I left Missouri the children all went with me except her, and I gave her [his wife] some money; and I came back here, and the children. I have made all that I have got now by my own hands, me and the children here, and that is the reason." That he was in good humor; did not seem to be annoyed, but felt that the children who had remained with and helped to earn the property which he had acquired were the rightful objects of his bounty and justly entitled to it under the circumstances. The evidence also shows that at the times mentioned he was as firm in the suspicion or belief that his son Calvin Jones was illegitimate as the contestant, and that he had indicated such belief by much more emphatic language than he had ever indulged in of the contestant; yet he did not exclude him from his share of the estate, but provided for him the same as he had the other children, guided by the principle that those who had remained with him and helped to accumulate the property which he was entitled to dispose of were the proper recipients of his bounty, and its application included his son Calvin, whom he had denounced in the days of his domestic troubles, and just before the separation from his wife, as a "tough-headed bastard."

In this review it will be seen nearly all the important facts in reference to his declarations of his wife's infidelity and the illegitimacy of the two children extend back nearly a quarter of a century, when their lives were embittered by estrangement and their paths rapidly diverging, which was soon to terminate in final separation and divorce. The latest evidence of real importance is Mrs. Jones', of what occurred about the time he procured his divorce in 1872, in which he reiterated his belief in his wife's infidelity and exhibited much temper in its asseveration. As to the circumstances upon which he predicates his belief in the infidelity of his wife and the illegitimacy of the two children, there is no evidence of their existence other than his declaration as stated by the witnesses; but we think the evidence shows that the testator believed that his wife was unfaithful to him, and so expressed himself to those whom he could talk with upon the subject as late as Mrs. Jones' evidence, to which we have just referred.

After this there is little or nothing heard of it, and that of little consequence, and when he did refer to it just before making his will it was without temper or reference to his former suspicions or accusations, and, by his conduct, indicating that his sense of injury was apparently healed over and its effects passed away. The important question for our decision now is, Was his belief in the infidelity of his wife and the illegitimacy of the two children an insane delusion, and, if so, was he so affected by such delusion at the time of the execution of his will as caused him to deprive the contestant of all benefit in his estate? This necessarily leads to the inquiry, What is an insane delusion? Sir John Nicholl in the celebrated case of Dew v. Clark, 8 Add. Eccl. 79, defined "insane delusions" in these words: "Wherever the patient once conceives something extravagant to exist, which still has no existence whatever but in his own heated imagination, and whenever at the same time, having so conceived, he is incapable of being, or at least of being permanently, reasoned out of the conception, such a patient is said to be under a delusion in a peculiar, half-technical sense of the term, and the absence or presence of delusion, so understood, forms in my judgment the true and only test or criterion of present or absent insanity." In Boughton v. Knight, 6 Moak, Eng. Rep. 353, Sir John Hannen adopted this definition, and expressed the belief that it would solve most if not all of the difficulties which arise in investigations of this kind. In Banks v. Goodfellow, L. R. 5 Q. B. 580, Cockburn, Ch. J., says: "When delusions exist which have no foundation in reality, and spring only from a diseased and morbid condition of the mind, to that extent the mind must necessarily be taken to be unsound." Chief Justice Denio said: "If a person persistently believes supposed facts which have no real existence except in his perverted imagination, and against all evidence and probability, and conducts himself, however logically, upon the assumption of their existence, he is, so far as they are concerned, under a morbid delusion; and delusion in that sense is insanity." American Seamen's Friend Soc. v. Hopper, 88 N. Y. 624. See also 11 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 107, title Insanity. The belief of facts which no rational person would have believed is insane delusion. 1 Wms. Exrs. 85; 1 Redf. Wills, 71. And in a later case, Middleitch v. Williams, 45 N. J. Eq. 736, 4 L. R. A. 785, Van Fleet, Vice-Chancellor, said that "according to these definitions, it is only a delusion or conception which springs up spontaneously in the mind of a testator, and is not the result of extrinsic evidence of any kind, that can be regarded as furnishing evidence that his mind is diseased or unsound; in other words, that he is subject to insane delusions. If, without evidence of any kind, he imagines or conceives something to exist which does not in fact exist, and which no rational person would, in the absence of evidence, believe to exist, then it is manifest that the only way in which his irrational belief can be accounted for is that it is the product of mental disorder. Delusions of this kind can be accounted for upon no reasonable theory except that they are the creations of the mind in which they originate."

Tested by these definitions, can it be said upon the facts as disclosed by this record that the testator was beset with an insane delusion in respect to the legitimacy of the contestant and her brother? The circumstances which he relates and upon which his belief is founded fix the place, identify the person and the manner of the improper meeting, and there is no evidence to show, nor is there any attempt to deny, that there was such a place or person or that such a meeting might not have occurred, only that the adulterous purposes which he ascribed and professed to believe to be the object of such meeting were so absolutely inconsistent with her known character for chastity as to be utterly unworthy of belief, and only to be accounted for in him upon the theory of an unnatural dislike or aversion which amounted to an insane delusion. The evidence in contradiction of his belief proceeds on the assumption that there may have been such a place and man and meeting, and if so, her known character for chastity, her every-day walk and life, render it impossible that it could have occurred for the foul purposes which he imputes, or otherwise than accidentally and without concert, or evil design in thought or deed. But these facts, however falsely or unjustly he may have reasoned from them, or however absurd his conclusions as applied to the wife and contestant impugned by them, nevertheless furnished the evidence which inspired his suspicions, and the ground upon which his belief was founded. It is conceded that the conclusions he drew from the facts are wholly unwarranted and without any justification, indicating at least an unrelenting, jealous disposition; but unjust and absurd as they may be, they were not the pure creations of a perverted imagination without any foundation in reality. Delusions are conceptions that originate spontaneously in the mind without evidence of any kind to support them, and can be accounted for on no reasonable hypothesis. The mind that is so disordered imagines something to exist, or imputes the existence of an offense, which no rational person would believe to exist or to have been committed without some kind of evidence to support it. They are as baseless as the fabric of a dream conjured into existence by a disordered or perverted imagination without any sort of foundation in fact. As in Smee v. Smee, L. R. 5 Prob. & Div. 84, the testator imagined himself to be the son of George IV., and that when he was born a large sum of money had been put in his father's hands for him, but which his father in fraud of his rights had distributed to his brothers; or as in Smith v. Tebbitt, L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. 398, the testatrix imagined herself to be one of the persons of the Trinity, and her chief legatee to be another. In cases like these the belief is the offspring of a disordered mind, and not induced by the existence of any facts or occurrences which could lend any sort of countenance to it. The case at bar is not such. Here there is a claim of facts upon which the belief is founded; and unjust and unfeeling as may be such belief, in view of the known character of his wife for chastity, it is not the spontaneous product of pure fancy, but a grave error showing a lack of judgment or a want of reasoning power, the outcome of an over-sensitive, jealous disposition, prone to exaggerate any trifling circumstance with which his wife may be connected into an unworthy and wicked importance, and to draw from them conclusions untenable, illogical and unworthy of belief. There is no doubt that the testator was extremely jealous of his wife, and, like all such, disposed to magnify any act or trifling occurrence into undue importance, and to make it the occasion to draw unworthy conclusions of her marital integrity. The experience of mankind has demonstrated that a wife may have a spotless character, she may be justly regarded in the estimation of her friends as without moral blemish and worthy of all confidence and affection, and yet it might happen to her to do some trivial act which would pass unnoticed by them, or anyone except the Argus eyes of an ever-watchful and jealous husband, who would stand ready to draw base conclusions from it derogatory to her chastity and character. To minds thus constituted, sometimes even a look of the wife, or perhaps a facetious or inadvertent remark, or some insignificant circumstance with which she may be associated, although it be wholly innocent, excites their distrust, and fills them with jealous rage; for it is as true now as when first uttered, that "trifles light as air are, to the jealous, confirmations strong as proofs of holy writ." To support the contention for the contestant, the belief or suspicion the testator entertained of his wife's infidelity and the illegitimacy of the children to be an insane delusion must have been wholly without foundation in reality, and the mere figment of his perverted imagination. But the evidence discloses that it was formed on an apparent cause, leading on his part to a view of his wife's conduct which we have admitted was erroneous, unjust and unnatural; yet this only shows an unfortunate error of judgment or a want of reasoning power, but not an absolute want of intellect upon the subject. The conclusion which he drew from the facts was untenable and erroneous, and showed that he formed a bad judgment upon an insufficient state of facts, but does not show that his conclusion or belief was formed without any foundation in fact whatever. But even if we assume that his belief was utterly groundless and without any cause, actual or apparent, to justify it, would that authorize us, in view of the circumstances of this cause, to declare the testator was the victim of an insane delusion? In Re Cole's Will, 49 Wis. 181, Lyon, J., said: "It must be conceded that the belief of the deceased in respect to the unchastity of his wife, persisted in as it was without evidence to support it, and against all reasonable probabilities of its truth, looks very much like insane delusion. Yet it is not necessarily so. Observation teaches us that there is a very large class of people, whose sanity is undoubted, who are unduly jealous or suspicious of others, and especially of those closely connected with them, and who upon the most trivial, even whimsical, grounds, will wrongfully impute the worst motives and conduct to those in whom they ought to confide. This insanity, which is developed in a great variety of forms, is altogether too common, and too many persons confessedly sane are to a greater or less extent afflicted with it, to justify us in saying that because the deceased was so afflicted he was insane or the victim of insane delusion. The line between the unfounded and unreasonable suspicions of a sane mind (for doubtless these are such) and insane delusions is sometimes quite indistinct and difficult to be defined." Nor is it enough that a delusion may have existed, but its connection with the will must be made manifest, and shown to have influenced its provisions, before the will can be set aside and declared void.

Nor must it be generally overlooked, in considering this point, that the period of time when the principal witnesses express the opinion that he was the victim of an insane delusion about the chastity of his wife relates to conduct and conversation and circumstances that occurred many years ago; that he was divorced from his wife in 1872, and that in the years succeeding little or nothing of real importance is ever heard of his suspicions, and when he did speak of her or the contestant in relation to the matter in hand it was with composure, or without insinuations against her marital integrity or the legitimacy of the children. It is necessary, therefore, to show, not only that he was the subject of a delusion, an insane hatred or aversion to his daughter, but that it was present when he executed his will, and influenced him in the making of it and in excluding her from its benefits. Upon this point the evidence has already been detailed, and it will be sufficient to briefly advert to it to show that those who were present at the execution of the will, including the subscribing witnesses and his physicians, all concur in the opinion that he was in the possession of all his faculties and free from any mental disturbance impairing his free agency; that he understood the extent of his property, and specified those among whom he wished it to be distributed. Several other witnesses there are with whom he conversed just prior to the making of his will which show his reasons for excluding the contestant, and his appreciation of the claims of those upon whom he thought his property ought to be bestowed. Among these were that the contestant was then in good circumstances; that she had separated from him in early life and chose to remain with her mother; that the property he had acquired was earned by himself and those to whom he intended to will it; that they had helped to lighten his burdens, sympathized with him and cheered him in adversity and disappointment, and were partners in its accumulation,—the justice of whose claims entitle them to it. Among those to whom he distributed his property was Calvin Jones, whom he had considered, as the contestant, to be illegitimate in the years gone by, yet he gave him his share based upon the principle already stated, and which he conceived to be just, and not on account of any belief in his illegitimacy. It would seem if he had been beset by any delusion of this kind it would have operated against him, for its effect is to impair free agency and cause the testator to do what he otherwise would not have done but for the presence of such delusion. His conduct before and at the time of the execution of the will are inconsistent with the existence of such delusion; no feeling of hatred or aversion is evinced; his mind acts from a sense of justice and affection which he feels he owes to those who have been his co-laborers, including Calvin, and influenced by that principle he distributes his estate accordingly. It may be harsh, and under some circumstances cruel, to disinherit one child and to distribute the estate among the others, but if the testator be of sound mind and execute his will as prescribed by law no court can interfere. "It may be contrary to the principles of justice and humanity, its provisions may be shockingly unnatural and extremely unjust, nevertheless, if it appears to have been made by a person of sufficient age to be competent to make a will, and also to be the free and unconstrained product of a sound mind, the courts are bound to uphold it." Middle-ditch v. Williams, supra. Sir John Hannen said: "He may disinherit either wholly or partially his children, and leave his property to strangers to gratify his spite, or charities to gratify his pride, and we must give effect to his will, however much we may condemn the course he has pursued." Boughton v. Knight, supra. And among the considerations which turn the scale in favor of the exercise of this testamentary power which may disregard the claim of kindred and disappoint their expectations, Cockburn, Ch. J., mentioned these: "Among those who, as a man's nearest relations, would be entitled to share the fortune he leaves behind, some may be better provided for than others; some may be more deserving than others; some, from age, sex or physical infirmity, may stand in greater need of assistance. Friendship and tried attachment or faithful services may have claims that ought not to be disregarded. In the power of rewarding dutiful and meritorious conduct, paternal authority finds a useful auxiliary; age secures the respect and attention which are its chief consolations." Banks v. Goodfellow, supra. The law is settled that if a testator, competent to make a will, executes it according to law, it cannot be disturbed for an inequality or unreasonableness in the distribution of his estate. He is under no obligation to devise it equally to his children or otherwise, but may devise it to a stranger. That fact may be considered as a circumstance in determining testamentary capacity, but, of itself, is not sufficient to set it aside. Where a delusion exists, and it is shown to have had an influence on the testamentary disposition of the property, as in Dow v. Clark, supra, consisting of an aversion to kindred, it is usually accompanied "with other signs," says Sir John Hannen, "which may be relied on to assist us in forming an opinion upon that point." In the case at bar we look in vain for them, but in that case it was the extraordinary importance the testator attached to medical electricity as a means of cure, which he conceived might be applied to almost every purpose. That case well illustrates the existence of a delusion, which consisted in an insane hatred without even the shadow of a cause of his child, persisted in through life, and his will, being shown to be the direct offspring of this delusion, was set aside and declared void. The facts in that case show that the testator entertained an unnatural dislike to his only daughter, whom he imagined vile and profligate, and whom he treated with the utmost severity, stripping her naked and unmercifully flogging her, and then rubbing her back with brine, compelling her to do degrading work, denying her decent clothes, denouncing her whenever she came in his presence, when she was in fact amiable, of superior talents, dutiful and affectionate; indicating that his instincts and affection had become perverted, and his mind a prey to an insane delusion which had affected his will and cut her off with an inadequate provision. But what possible similitude can the case at bar bear to that case? It is true the father of the contestant did not caress her, nor does it seem that he did the other children; but he did not repulse her, and she owns that she disliked him, and perhaps justly; but he did not whip her, although he did some of the other children; nor did he maltreat her, or make any display of any unkind feeling. When his wife decided to leave him and the contestant chose to go with her he gave them money, and the preponderance of evidence is that he gave them their share of what he then possessed. He does not seem to have been a lovable man. He was sensitive and jealous, and, like all such, when brooding over some supposed wrong, indulged in a harsh and cruel judgment against the fidelity of his wife and the legitimacy of two of the children, but this conduct was marked by no course of harsh treatment, no bursts of violence, no display of outrages, or other indignities that we have noticed, and these were only denounced to a few, and generally to those in whom he had a right to confide. The truth is, after their separation, as time passed, his sense of injury seems to have gradually healed over and its effects to have passed away, for after this he begins to acquire property, to take an interest in the affairs of his community, and to command the respect and confidence of his friends and acquaintances for his probity and business character; and during all this time so little is said by him to anyone of his former grievances or belief, that his daughters are not aware of it until the commencement of this trial. Nor can we find any case upon facts analogous to these, in which it has been held fatal to the validity of the will.

In a recent case (Barbo v. Rider, 67 Wis. 600), in which it was held that the appellant was the victim of an insane delusion and mentally incompetent to care for himself or his estate, the evidence showed that his health had been impaired by excessive drinking; that after living happily with his wife for more than twenty years, suddenly and without cause he conceived the idea she had been untrue to him, that she submitted her person to the criminal embraces of a number of men, some of whom she scarcely knew, and that some of these men had begotten children upon her; that he charged her with it and repeated it to all who would listen to him, wrote an incoherent and indecent letter on the subject, became morose and sullen, ceased to take any interest in his family or business, and wandered aimlessly into the fields; that he begged for a division of the property, refused to take medicine, and believed that his friends were trying to poison him. As the court said: "No argument is required to prove that such a change in the nat ure and conduct of Barbo, such unreasonable and unfounded hallucinations respecting the chastity of his wife, and his causeless hostility to his family, which yield to no reason or persuasion, are sufficient evidence that he is the unfortunate victim of insane delusion." These cases illustrate delusions, but they are essentially different from the case under consideration. While it seems harsh and cruel, so counter to all the feelings of our nature, that a parent should disinherit one of his children and devise his property to the others, or to cut them all off and devise it to strangers, from some unworthy motive, yet so long as that motive, whether from pride or aversion, spite or prejudice, is not resolvable into mental perversion, no court can interfere. Reliance can usually be placed on the affections, independent of the law, which parents have for their children, to recognize their claim in the testamentary disposition of their estate. But while this is so, the law recognizes the right of the testator to leave his property to whomsoever he chooses to bestow it, and in the exercise of that right, he may have reason satisfactory to himself why some of his children should enjoy his estate while others are excluded. Some may be more deserving than others, — more needful of help for various causes; some may have contributed largely to its acquisition. These and various other reasons may exert an influence in favor of some and in exclusion of others. The law being so, upon the facts as disclosed by this record, we must give it as our judgment that the will of the testator, sought to be impeached by this proceeding, is valid, and not the product of an insane delusion; and in conclusion it is perhaps due to say that whatever suspicions or belief the testator entertained of his wife's infidelity are refuted by this record; that no wife or mother could be guilty of dishonoring the bed of her husband, and bastardizing her children, whose reputation for chastity and domestic duties were attested by so many respectable witnesses and contradicted by none.

BILL in equity to enjoin the exercise of a power of sale contained in a mortgage bond to secure the payment of certain corporate bonds. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Samuel Dickson and R. C. Dale for complainants.

Messrs. George Shiras, Jr., and Johns McCleave for defendant the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company.

Atcheson, J., delivered the following opinion:

On the 29th day of March, 1886, the firm of Samuel R. Bullock & Co. and the Corry Water-Works Company, a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania, entered into a contract whereby the former agreed to construct for the latter water-works in the City of Corry, Erie County, Pa., according to certain plans and specifications, and to pay all the expenses, legal fees and salaries which might be needed to maintain and operate the works for a period of six months after completion, and to pay the first six months' interest,—viz., $3,000,—on the hereinafter-mentioned mortgage bonds of the Water-Works Company; and, in consideration thereof, the Water-Works Company agreed to issue and deliver to said Bullock & Co. $100,000 in bonds, and $125,000 in the full paid-up non-assessable stock of the Water-Works Company. Bullock & Co. proceeded to construct the water-works, and fulfilled their part of the contract, and the Water-Works Company issued and delivered to them the bonds and stock, as agreed on. The bonds bear date April 1, 1886, are each of the denomination of $1,000, and are payable to Samuel R. Bullock & Co., or bearer, on the 1st day of April, 1916, with interest coupons annexed payable to bearer, semi-annually, and the bonds are secured by a mortgage, or deed of trust, of even date, covering all the property, real and personal, rights, privileges and franchises of the Water-Works Company, executed and delivered by said Company to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company (defendant in this suit), a corporation of the State of New York, as trustee. The last-named Company accepted the trust, and the mortgage, or trust deed, was duly recorded in the County of Erie, Pa., on April 18, 1886. In the month of October, 1886, the National Water-Works Investment Company, a corporation of the State of New York, purchased from Samuel R. Bullock & 12 L. R. A.

Co. all of said bonds, together with $50,000 of their said stock, for the cash price of $90,000, which sum was paid to Bullock & Co. by said investment company upon the delivery of the bonds, and said bonds are still owned by that company. The Water-Works Company made default of the payment of the interest on said bonds, due April 1, 1889, and thereupon, and in accordance with the terms of the mortgage, or trust deed, the National Water-Works Investment Company, the holder of the whole issue of said bonds, elected, as it had the right to do, to declare the principal of the bonds to be due and payable; and, after such election, the default still continuing, the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company, the trustee, upon the written request of the holder of the bonds, took possession of the property embraced in the mortgage, or trust deed, for the purposes therein declared; and, in further execution of the power thereby conferred, advertised at public sale, and was about to proceed so to sell, the mortgaged property and the rights and franchises of the Water-Works Company, when the bill in this case was filed by the plaintiffs, R. D. Wood & Co., stockholders of the Corry Water-Works Company.

The main purpose of the bill is to enjoin the exercises by the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company of the power of sale given by the said trust mortgage, on the ground that the same is an invalid instrument, and conferred no estate or rightful authority upon the trustee. In support of this proposition, three reasons were assigned and urged by the plaintiffs' counsel at the final hearing, namely: "First. Because the issue of bonds which it attempts to secure was an increase of the corporate indebtedness without the consent of the persons holding the larger amount in value of the stock obtained at a meeting to be held after sixty days' notice. Second. Because the amount of mortgage bonds issued exceeded one half of the capital stock paid in, the evidence in the cause showing, substantially, that nothing was ever paid in on account of the capital stock. Third. Because it appears from the evidence that, by the attempted issue of stock and bonds to Bullock & Co., under the construction contract, there was a fictitious increase of stock and indebtedness, which, by the terms of the Constitution, are void."

The plaintiffs rely upon the provisions of the Corporation Laws of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, which limit the right of such a corporation to issue bonds secured by a mortgage to an amount not exceeding one half the capital stock paid in, and require the previous consent of the stockholders at a meeting called for the purpose, and upon section 7, art. 16, of the Constitution of the State, which provides: "No corporation shall issue stocks or bonds except for money, labor done or money or property actually received; and all fictitious increase of stock or indebtedness shall be void. The stock and indebtedness of corporations shall not be increased, except in pursuance of general law, nor without the consent of the persons holding the larger amount in value of the stock first obtained at a meeting to be held after sixty days' notice given in pursuance of law."

Before approaching the consideration of the legal questions involved, certain matters of fact must be stated. It appears that the meeting of the stockholders of the Water-Works Company, at which the issue of the mortgage bonds was authorized, was not called for that purpose, but to vote upon the proposition to increase the capital stock from $20,000 to $200,000. It is, however, shown that all the stockholders of the Company except one,—viz., Charles S. Wallace,—were present at that meeting, and voted in favor of the issue of the bonds and the execution of the mortgage, or trust deed, to secure them; and it is further satisfactorily established that Wallace was only the nominal owner of the stock standing in his name, and that the real owner thereof was Ellis Morrison, who was present at the meeting and voted in favor of the issue of the mortgage bonds. Furthermore, the trust mortgage on its face bears this recital: "And whereas, this form of mortgage, or trust deed, was at a meeting of the stockholders of the Water Company, held on the 29th day of March, A. D. 1886, duly approved and ratified, and the proper officers directed to execute the same in the name of the Water Company."

The bill alleges that the cost of the construction of the said water-works was only about $60,000, but the proofs do not sustain this allegation. On the contrary, Samuel R. Bullock testifies that the entire cost, including the expenses the contractors assumed for the first six months after completion, etc., "was in the neighborhood of $121,000," and I do not see why this estimate should not be accepted as substantially correct. The plaintiffs claim to be the owners of 1,420 shares of the stock of the Corry Water-Works Company. The whole of this stock, however, came from Samuel R. Bullock & Co. originally, and was part of the stock that firm received from the Water-Works Company, under their construction contract. The plaintiffs' title to 920 shares of this stock is under an assignment from said firm, dated November 10, 1888, and they have possession of the stock certificate for these 920 shares. But, in fact, that certificate had been surrendered to the Company for cancellation, and other certificates had been issued for at least part of this stock, and how much stock, if any, the plaintiffs are entitled to on this certificate is not shown. The plaintiffs' title to the other 500 shares of stock is good. They acquired those shares in February, 1889, from the National Water-Works Investment Company, at a valuation of $1 per share, the transaction being this: The plaintiffs were creditors of Samuel R. Bullock & Co., and held, as collateral securities for their claims, stocks in various water-works companies; and the investment company was also the holder of such stock which had been acquired from said firm. Upon the failure of that firm, with a view to a severance of their interests, mutual stock transfers were made between the plaintiffs and the investment company, and the plaintiffs thus acquired said 500 shares of the Corry Water-Works Company's stock at the valuation mentioned.

Upon the undisputed facts, it is very difficult to see the standing the plaintiffs have in a court of equity, in virtue of any rights of their own, 12 L. R. A.

to assail the transaction between the Corry Water-Works Company and Samuel R. Bullock & Co., of which they complain. Dimpfel v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 110 U. S. 209, 28 L. ed. 121; Columbia Nat. Bank's App. 16 W. N. C. 357; Graham v. La Crosse & M. R. Co. 103 U. S. 148, 26 L. ed. 106; Monroe v. Smith, 79 Pa. 450. They were not shareholders of the corporation at the time of the transaction, and were not injured by what took place. The contract had been fully executed long before the plaintiffs acquired their shares of stock, and they took them with full knowledge that the bonds and mortgage of the corporation were outstanding and unpaid. Moreover, the very stock they now hold was part of the issue to Samuel R. Bullock & Co., under the construction contract which they now impugn. But in this controversy the plaintiffs may be considered as representing the corporation itself, and clothed with its rights. Is it then open to the corporation to defend against the bonds and mortgage, or trust deed, or to question their validity? At the outset of the discussion, it is to be borne in mind that the bonds are negotiable instruments, and were purchased before maturity in the open market, for a large price, by the National Water-Works Investment Company, without notice of anything affecting their validity. Furthermore, this is not a case of a total want of power in the corporation to act. Undoubtedly, the Corry Water-Works Company had the right to create an indebtedness for the purpose of constructing its works, and to issue therefor bonds secured by a mortgage or trust deed; and the utmost that can be said in impeachment of its action is that, in the exercise of the power, it did not conform to the requirements and limitations which the law imposed upon the Company. But, in Oil Creek & A. River R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Transp. Co., 88 Pa. 160, it was distinctly ruled by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania that where a corporation has entered into a contract which has been fully executed by the other party, and nothing remains to be done but for it to pay the consideration money, it will not be allowed to set up that the contract was ultra vires. And in Wright v. Pipe Line Co., 101 Pa. 204, it was held that where a corporation, although prohibited by its charter, contracted for the purchase of stock in another corporation, and the contract was executed by the delivery of the stock, in an action on a promissory note given for the price of the stock, in the hands of a holder for value, it could not defend on the ground that the contract was beyond its corporate powers.

Turning now to the specific objections urged against the validity of the bonds and trust mortgage, we find that in the case of Columbia Nat. Bank's App., supra, in which an issue of corporate stock was involved, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania held that the only object of the prescribed notice of a proposed increase of stock was to give information to the shareholders, and if they had such knowledge from any source it was enough. Now, every shareholder of the Corry Water-Works Company was present when the issue of the bonds and trust mortgage was determined on, and all voted in favor of that measure. Again, in Manhattan Hardware Co. v. Phalen, 128 Pa.

110, where, to a scire facias on a mortgage of a corporation, the receiver of the corporation made defense that the debt was not authorized by a previous meeting and consent of stockholders, as directed by section 7, art. 16, of the Constitution, and the Act of April 18, 1874, the defense was overruled, the court holding that when a corporation has received the benefit of money borrowed on its mortgage, and the stockholders knew of it, and made no objection within a reasonable time to the lack of authority in the corporate officers to make the loan, neither the corporation, its stockholders nor its creditors can set up such want of authority in a suit on the mortgage, nor can the receiver of the company do so for them. In Read's App., 123 Pa. 585, it was declared by the court that a contractor who had knowledge that under a trust mortgage of a corporation the issue of bonds was in excess of the capital stock paid in, and who was a participant in the fraud of such issue, could not attack the validity of the mortgage as in violation of the Statute. No more, in my judgment, is it competent for the corporation itself, which has received and enjoys the fruits of its mortgage bonds, to assail their validity in the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value, on such ground.

We have already seen that the consideration which passed from Samuel R. Bullock & Co. to the Corry Water-Works Company was largely in excess of the whole issue of the mortgage bonds, and this, too, without taking into consideration a contractor's profit. Therefore, there is really no ground for the assertion that the indebtedness so created was fictitious, and, certainly, under the facts of this case, neither the corporation nor its stockholders can be heard so to allege to the prejudice of the innocent bondholder. If the construction contract, as a whole, offended against the constitutional and statutory provisions here invoked, the corrective power resides in the Commonwealth, which alone can now complain of the completed transaction. Columbia Nat. Bank's App. supra.

This principle, which indeed is decisive of the entire case, was recognized as sound, and was enforced, in Union Nat. Bank of St. Louis v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621, 25 L. ed. 188, where a mortgagor sought to enjoin a sale of the mortgaged premises under a power contained in the mortgage, on the ground that it was taken in violation of the National Banking Law; and in Pritts v. Palmer, 193 U. S. 263, 38 L. ed. 817, where a foreign corporation had purchased land, and taken a conveyance thereof in direct violation of the laws of the State in which the land was situated, it was nevertheless held that the corporation took the title as against its grantor and his subsequent grantee, and that it was for the State alone to question the validity of the deed of conveyance to the corporation.

Actual manual delivery not essential.

It is not necessary, to constitute a delivery of a deed, that there should be an actual manual delivery; if it is so disposed of as to evince clearly the intention of the parties that it should take effect as a conveyance, it is a sufficient delivery. Conlan v. Grace, 36 Minn. 276; Ward v. Small (Ky.) 12 Ky. L. Rep. 58, citing Stevens v. Hatch, 6 Minn. 64; Schmitt v. Schmitt, 31 Minn. 106; Thompson v. Easton, Id. 90; Gaston v. Merriam, 38 Minn. 271; Newton v. Realer, 41 Iowa 384; Somers v. Pumphrey, 24 Ind. 281, 248; Orr v. Clark (Vt.) April 22, 1890; Hubbard v. Cox, 78 Tex. 230.

Where the grantee in a deed of trust agreed to accept the trust, and the deed was put on record pursuant to directions of the grantor, the delivery was sufficient. Steele v. Lowry, 4 Ohio, 72, 19 Am. Dec. 583.

But a delivery of a deed not beneficial to the grantee, of property heavily incumbered, cannot be inferred from the bare record of the deed. Gifford v. Corrigan, 7 Cent. Rep. 277, 105 N. Y. 222. See Jackson v. Phipps, 12 Johns. 418; Jackson v. Bodie, 20 Johns. 184; Church v. Gilman, 15 Wend. 656; Elsey v. Metcalf, 1 Denio, 822.

The acknowledging and recording of a deed without grantee's knowledge or consent does not debt, nor upon the form of the indebtedness; it depends rather upon the existence of the debt it was given to secure. It may be valid without a note or bond, although it purports to secure, and substantially describes, a note or bond. The true state of the indebtedness need not be disclosed by the instrument, but in cases free from fraud may be shown by parol.

3. It being evident that a claim asserted to certain real property by one of two defendants was admitted by the plaintiffs to be as determined upon the trial, it was error, as to such defendant, for the court below to grant plaintiffs' motion for a new trial.

of itself amount to delivery. Weber v. Christen, 9 West. Rep. 798, 121 Ill. 91, citing Parker v. Hill, 8 Met. 447; Jackson v. Phipps, supra; Woodbury v. Fisher, 20 Ind. 388; Parmelee v. Simpson, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 81, 18 L. ed. 542; Herbert v. Herbert, 2 Ill. 278. Where the grantor shortly after the execution and record of his deeds repossessed himself of them, retaining possession until his death, and remaining in possession of the property, there was no delivery of the deeds. Weber v. Christen, supra.

But a mere execution of a voluntary deed, with neither the trustee nor the beneficiary present, and no publication of its contents made, will not be construed a delivery of it. Wood v. Ingraham, 8 Strobh. Eq. 105, 51 Am. Dec. 672. And see Fisher v. Hall, 41 N. Y. 422.

Exception to rule.

To constitute a delivery, the grantor must part with the possession of the deed, or the right to retain it. Younge v. Guilbeau, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 636, 18 L. ed. 262.

But it is not necessary, to constitute complete delivery, that the instrument should leave the actual possession of the grantor. Folly v. Vantuyl, 9 N. J. L. 198; Crawford v. Bertholf, 1 N. J. Eq. 458; Cannon v. Cannon, 26 N. J. Eq. 319; Ruckman v. Ruckman, 33 N. J. Eq. 354.

Where a deed is sealed and delivered, and there is nothing to qualify the delivery except the keeping of the deed in the hands of the executing party, and nothing to show that he did not intend it to operate immediately, it is a valid deed. Durauid v. Dych, 7 Cent. Rep. 898, 116 Pa. 92.

The mere fact of the maker retaining the instrument in his own keeping, intending that it should be considered as executed and delivered, will not render it invalid for want of delivery. Wall v. Wall, 30 Miss. 97; Squires v. Summers, 35 Ind. 254; Bogie v. Bogie, 35 Wis. 688; Porter v. Cole, 4 Me. 25; Blight v. Schenck, 10 Pa. 235; Welch v. Sackett, 12 Wis. 244; Wallace v. Berdell, 97 N. Y. 22, hinted; Fisher v. Hall, 41 N. Y. 422. See Payne v. Powell, 5 Bush. 251; Wallace v. Berdell, 97 N. Y. 22.

If fully executed it is valid in the hands of the grantor, if there be nothing to qualify the delivery. Roosevelt v. Carow, 6 Barb. 195.

If both parties are present, and the contract to all appearances consummated, it is a complete and valid deed, notwithstanding it remains in custody of the grantor. Rose v. Rose, 7 Barb. 178; McLean v. Button, 19 Barb. 458.

A deed will take effect though found in grantor's 12 L. R. A.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gilliland, Belden & Willard for appellants.

Mr. M. B. Koon, with Messrs. Little & Nunn, for respondents:

The mortgage, if there was anything whatever for it to secure, would stand for security for only the actual indebtedness of the mortgagor to the mortgagee. The indebtedness is the principal thing and the mortgage is an incident to the indebtedness, and without such indebtedness intended thereby to be secured there can be no valid mortgage.

Hodgdon v. Shannon, 44 N. H. 572; Baker v. Collins, 9 Allen. 253; Bramhall v. Flood, 41 Conn. 68.

The mortgagee or her assigns cannot tack to or substitute for the actual indebtedness intended to be secured other or different indebtedness though equally meritorious with that intended to be thus secured; much less an indebtedness that exists merely in conjecture.

Edwards v. Dwight, 68 Ala. 389; Wilkerson deak, if circumstances indicate an intention to consider it delivered. Linton v. Brown, 20 Fed. Rep. 487; Adams v. Adams, 36 U. S. 21 Wall. 185, 22 L. ed. 504.

Undoubtedly the general rule is, a deed takes effect from its delivery and acceptance, and most generally mutual and concurrent acts. Where the exception to the general rule is most frequently recognized is in cases of voluntary settlements. In such cases a common rule of the law of general application is, the "first deed and the last will" shall stand. A will is most generally retained by the testator, and so a deed making a voluntary settlement may be retained by the grantor and still take effect. Cline v. Jones, 111 Ill. 574.

A voluntary settlement fairly made is always binding on the grantor, unless there be clear and decisive proof that he never parted nor intended to part with the possession of the deed, even if he retains it. Shrader v. Bonker, 65 Barb. 615; Brinckerhoff v. Lawrence, 2 Sandf. Ch. 404, 7 L. ed. 643; Dempey v. Tylee, 3 Duer. 96; Brown v. Brown, 1 Woodb. & M. 331.

There must be other facts to show that it was not intended to be absolute. Wallace v. Berdell, 97 N. Y. 22; Van Valen v. Schomerhorn, 22 How. Pr. 430.

Where a man declared his intention to convey lands to his minor son, and executed a deed and delivered it to a neighbor, saying to him, "You take that deed and file it for record," and on the latter's suggestion not to file it at present he responded, "You take that deed and keep it safely," the delivery must be held to have been absolute. Standiford v. Standiford, 3 L. R. A. 299, and note, 97 Mo. 321.

A subsequent filing for record, whether before or after the father's death, was merely the consummation of the delivery to the son as of the date of the delivery to the neighbor in trust. Ibid.

Effect of retention by vendor till his death.

If it be retained in the possession and control of the grantor until his death it cannot become effective by delivery thereafter by an agent, under his instructions. Weisinger v. Cocke, 67 Miss. 511. See Cook v. Brown, 34 N. H. 460; Brown v. Brown, 66 Me. 316; Prutman v. Baker, 30 Wis. 644.

There can be no valid delivery of a deed after the grantee's death. McElroy v. Hiner, 123 Ill. 139; Stone v. French, 37 Kan. 145; Durauid v. Dych, 7 Cent. Rep. 898, 116 Pa. 92.

Though both husband and wife have executed a deed, yet if it has not been delivered until after

The actual indebtedness is all that can be held to be secured by the mortgage.

Nazro v. Ware, 38 Minn. 448; John v. New York Guaranty & L. Co. 101 U. S. 632, 25 L. ed. 1080.

The debt and mortgage are inseparable.

Wilson v. Eigenbrodt, 30 Minn. 4.

The fact that the note was never executed has an important bearing upon the question of delivery.

Brigham v. Brown, 44 Mich. 60; Jones, Mort. § 614.

The delivery and acceptance must be the concurrent act of both parties. The registration of a deed by the grantor, without the grantee's knowledge or assent, does not of itself operate as delivery of a deed.

1 Devlin, Deeds, § 290; 3 Washb. Real Prop. 4th ed. p. 292; Ruckman v. Ruckman, 6 Fed.

her death, it will not be enforced against her heirs. Shoenberger v. Zook, 34 Pa. 24; Shoenberger v. Hackman, 37 Pa. 37; 1 Devlin, Deeds, p. 95.

A deed in due form, properly signed and acknowledged, but never delivered, its existence being unknown to the grantee until after the grantor's death, passes no title. Miller v. Murfield, 79 Iowa, 64. See Otto v. Doty, 61 Iowa, 28.

Where a deed was placed in a trunk by the grantor, to be taken possession of by his wife only in the event of his death, where it remained for twenty years, the grantee taking no possession of it until institution of a mechanics' lien suit against her, when she destroyed it, there was no delivery. Price v. Hudson, 135 Ill. 284.

Where the grantor lived in the family of his son, and made no effort to deliver the deed, and gave no authority to grantee to take it from the tin box in which it was placed, and never spoke of the deed, and the deed could not be found after the grantor's death, it cannot be held to have been delivered. The presumption is that the grantor destroyed it. Anderson v. Anderson (Ind.) June 6, 1890.

Where a deed which, although purporting to be absolute, was intended to operate only upon the grantor's death, after being retained for some time by the grantor, was delivered to the grantee to be deposited in a box for safe keeping, and not with a view of vesting in him a present ownership of the property, there is no delivery of it, as the deed of the grantor; and being an attempted testamentary disposition not in compliance with the Statute of Wills, the title never passes out of the grantor. Bovee v. Hinde (Ill.) Oct. 31, 1890. See Stone v. French, 37 Kan. 145.

But under the Arkansas statutes a deed conveying an estate of freehold to commence in future is valid; and a deed to grantor's son to take effect at grantor's death, duly signed, acknowledged and delivered, is a conveyance of the present title, with possession and use postponed, and not a will. Bunch v. Nicka, 50 Ark. 367.

Formal delivery not necessary.

No particular formality is necessary to the delivery of a deed. The Lady Superior v. McNamara, 3 Barb. Ch. 378, 5 L. ed. 989.

A deed may be delivered by doing something and saying nothing, or by saying something and doing nothing, or it may be by both. Flint v. Phipps, 16 Or. 437. See Jackson v. Phipps, 12 Johns. 421; Byers v. McClanahan, 6 Gill & J. 256; Stewart v. Redditt, 12 L. R. A.

The delivery of a deed after the death of the grantor is not sufficient to pass title.

Jackson v. Leek, 12 Wend. 107; Fisher v. Hall, 41 N. Y. 416; Jackson v. Phipps, 12 Johns. 418; Walsh v. Vermont Mut. F. Ins. Co. 54 Vt. 352; Prutsman v. Baker, 30 Wis. 644.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The form and manner of delivery are not important so long as it is the manifest intention of the grantor to deliver. Hubbard v. Cox, 78 Tex. 239; Ward v. Small (Ky.) 13 Ky. L. Rep. 58; Conlan v. Grace, 36 Minn. 273; Devlin, Deeds, §§ 231, 232, 233.

It is sufficient if it is so disposed of as to evince clearly the intention of the parties that it should take effect as a conveyance. Orr v. Clark (Vt.) April 22, 1890; Conlan v. Grace, supra; 3 Washb. Real Prop. 300.

To constitute a delivery of a deed there must be a complete surrender and parting with the control of the same by the grantor, and it must pass under the control and power of the grantee or some person in his behalf. Anderson v. Anderson (Ind.) June 6, 1890; Stevens v. Stevens, 150 Mass. 557.

Intention necessary to delivery of deed.

Intention is necessary to the delivery of a deed, and must exist in the minds of the parties, evidenced by words or acts. Hill v. McNichol, 6 New Eng. Rep. 445, 50 Me. 209; Weber v. Christen, 9 West. Rep. 790, 121 Ill. 91; Stevens v. Castel, 5 West. Rep. 727, 63 Mich. 111; Bryan v. Wash, 7 Ill. 537; Gunnell v. Cockerill, 79 Ill. 79; Dwinell v. Bliss, 2 New Eng. Rep. 605, 56 Vt. 353; Cole v. Cole, 24 S. C. 597.

There must be a clear manifestation of the intention of the grantor to give up control of it and that it shall at once become operative to pass the title. Bovee v. Hinde (Ill.) Oct. 31, 1890; Byars v. Spencer, 101 Ill. 429.

Delivery a question of intent.

The delivery of a deed is a question of intent. McGrath v. Hyde, 81 Cal. 38; Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 554.

And intention is a fact to be found by the trier; thus, a recorded deed was declared void, where the master found that the grantor merely left it in the possession of the grantee, but never delivered it as a deed. Dwinell v. Bliss, 2 New Eng. Rep. 605, 56 Vt. 353.

This intention may be made satisfactorily to appear, either from the circumstances of the transaction or from the acts or words of the grantor. Crawford v. Bertholf, 1 N. J. Eq. 467; Folly v. Vantuyt, 9 N. J. L. 198; Cannon v. Cannon, 26 N. J. Eq. 316; Ruckman v. Ruckman, 32 N. J. Eq. 256; Brown v. Brown, 66 Me. 319; Armstrong v. Armstrong, 19 thony, in the actual possession of plaintiffs. The defendant Gilfillan disclaimed any interest in lot 4, but set up a counterclaim of title to an undivided half of lot 5. The referee, by whom the case was tried, found him to be the owner of such undivided half, and this seems to be conceded by all parties. The defendant Libby was not served with the summons, nor did she appear on the trial. The issues raised by the answer of defendant Fletcher were passed upon by the referee, who ordered judgment on his findings of fact against the plaintiffs, and from an order of the district court granting a new trial the answering defendants Gilfillan and Fletcher appeal. There was but little dispute over the facts. Plaintiffs have the legal title to that portion of the property not owned by the defendant Gilfillan, having derived their title from a purchaser at a sale made by the administrator of the estate of James A. Lennon, deceased. Lennon was the owner in fee on July 10, 1877. He was then indebted to the defendant Sarah Libby, in the sum of $700, at least. Miss Libby was not then in the State of Minnesota, her residence being in Massachusetts. On the day last mentioned Lennon executed and acknowledged a mortgage in due form upon this and other real property to defendant Libby, to secure the payment to her, as was therein stated, of the sum of $5,000, according to the conditions of his promissory note of even date. On the morning of July 12, Lennon left this mortgage with the register of deeds at his office, with instructions to place the same upon record, which was done. He gave no instructions as to a disposition of the instrument when recorded. In the afternoon of the same day Lennon took his own life. There had never been any agreement between him and Miss Libby that she should be secured by a mortgage, nor did the mortgagee know of the existence of the mortgage until some days after Lennon had suicided; nor was there a note of any amount executed by him to Miss Libby. In the year 1878 the attorney for the mortgagee obtained possession of the recorded

N. J. Eq. 387; Weber v. Christen, 9 West. Rep. 790, 121 Ill. 91.

Delivery of a deed is presumed from concurrent acts of parties recognizing a transfer of title. Gould v. Day, 94 U. S. 405, 24 L. ed. 232.

The delivery and acceptance of a deed is sufficiently proved by evidence of the grantor that she meant to execute a will, and thought the instrument executed by her was a will, together with the testimony by the judge before whom it was drawn that he read a portion and explained the rest of the deed to her, and that nothing was said about a will. Messelback v. Norman, 46 Hun. 414.

Deeds were duly delivered where they were handed with other papers to one of the grantees by the grantor, saying, "There are the deeds; put them away;" and, later, "Put these papers away carefully; they will be of use to you when I am gone." Lutes v. Reed (Pa.) Nov. 3, 1890.

Where a husband had a deed of land duly executed, and went home and threw it on the table, saying, "There is a deed of that property to you; put it away;" and the wife took it up and looked at it, and, after saying that it was not necessary to have it recorded, the husband put it away in his trunk,—it was held a sufficient delivery to the wife. McGrath v. Hyde, 81 Cal. 38.

Delivery to third person sufficient.

A delivery of a deed to a third person for the benefit of the grantee is a sufficient delivery, where there is no contingency. Rose v. Baker, 18 Barb. 233; Brown v. Brown, 1 Woodb. & M. 380; Munoz v. Wilson, 111 N. Y. 303; Murphy v. Briggs, 39 N. Y. 450; Peavey v. Tilton, 18 N. H. 151; Buffum v. Green, 5 N. H. 80; Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Mass. 307, 6 Am. Dec. 67; Jones v. Jones, 6 Conn. 111, 16 Am. Dec. 39; Bunn v. Winthrop, 1 Johns. Ch. 387, 1 L. ed. 103; Shrader v. Bonker, 65 Barb. 615; Ernst v. Reed, 49 Barb. 367; Brown v. Austen, 35 Barb. 341; Roosevelt v. Carow, 6 Barb. 190; Verplank v. Sterry, 12 Johns. 538; Rathbun v. Rathbun, 6 Barb. 98; Diefendorf v. Diefendorf, 29 N. Y. S. R. 122; Ward v. Small (Ky.) 12 Ky. L. Rep. 58.

Yet such a delivery will not be good, as against an intervening attachment, prior to the assent of the grantee. Derry Bank v. Webster, 44 N. H. 260.

A deed left unconditionally with a third person for the use of a grantee who is not under guardianship, and received by the grantee under circumstances indicating acceptance, is sufficiently delivered, and conveys title even though the grantee be of unsound mind. Campbell v. Kuhn, 45 Mich. 12 L. R. A.

516; Hoxley v. Holmes, 27 Mich. 416; Latham v. Udell, 38 Mich. 238; Gardner v. Collins, 3 Mass. 308; Gould v. Day, 94 U. S. 405, 24 L. ed. 232; Concord Bank v. Bellis, 10 Cush. 278; Regan v. Howe, 121 Mass. 424; Hastings v. Merriam, 117 Mass. 245; Buffum v. Green, 5 N. H. 71; Merrill v. Swift, 18 Conn. 267; Tibbals v. Jacobs, 31 Conn. 438; Jones v. Swayze, 42 N. J. L. 279; Mitchell v. Ryan, 3 Ohio St. 377; Berry v. Anderson, 22 Ind. 36; Kingsbury v. Burnside, 58 Ill. 310; Robinson v. Gould, 26 Iowa, 59; Kerr v. Birnie, 25 Ark. 225; Farrar v. Bridges, 5 Humph. 411; Wesson v. Stephens, 3 Ired. Eq. 557; Frost v. Peacock, 4 Edw. Ch. 678, 6 L. ed. 1016.

Where one brother sold land, executed a deed therefor, and left it with a sister, and received the purchase price from the grantee, the deed must be regarded as having been delivered to the grantee. McCormick v. McCormick, 71 Iowa, 379.

Under a contract to sell and convey to several persons, a delivery to one of the co-contractors is a delivery to all. Payne v. Bohols (Pa.) Oct. 20, 1896.

A deed to two trustees is sufficiently delivered when it is placed in the hands of one of them, who received and held it for some time, and then gave it to the party chiefly interested, for safe keeping. Hitz v. National Metropolitan Bank, 111 U. S. 722, 28 L. ed. 577.

There is a sufficient delivery of a written instrument executed by joint tenants for the purpose of conveying the fee to the survivor, where it is by mutual consent left in the possession of the tenant by whom it was drawn, with a declaration as to its purpose. Orr v. Clark (Vt.) April 22, 1890.

A deed delivered to a third party for the use and benefit of the grantee named therein will be operative upon its delivery after the death of the grantor, and such delivery will relate back to the prior delivery. Jones v. Jones, 6 Conn. 111, 16 Am. Dec. 40; Wheelwright v. Wheelwright, 2 Mass. 454, 3 Am. Dec. 66; Mather v. Corlies, 108 Mass. 568; Stone v. Duval, 77 Ill. 476; Thatcher v. St. Andrew's Church, 37 Mich. 264; Stephens v. Rinehart, 73 Pa. 434; Hathaway v. Payne, 34 N. Y. 92; Wallace v. Harris, 32 Mich. 380; Ellis v. Secor, 31 Mich. 185, 18 Am. Dec. 188; Goodpaster v. Leathera, 123 Ind. 121; Brown v. Danforth, 29 N. Y. S. R. 430.

Where a father purchases land and directs the conveyance to be made to his daughter, who is now compos, saying that he does it as a provision for her on account of her infirmity, a delivery of the deed to the father is a sufficient delivery to the daughter, whose assent will be presumed. Eastham v. Powell, 51 Ark. 530.

mortgage for her, it having previously been in the hands of the administrator before mentioned. The defendant Fletcher is the owner and holder of the mortgage, having purchased the same from defendant Libby, and it was this mortgage interest which he asserted against the plaintiffs' claim of title in fee to the real property described in the complaint. For several years prior to his decease Lennon and Miss Libby had been engaged to be married. During this engagement, at various times, she had sent him money to invest for her. He had accounted for this money in part; the indebtedness referred to was for the balance. The referee found that when Lennon executed the mortgage he intended to give to Miss Libby the difference between the amount of such indebtedness (the exact amount not being found) and the sum of $5,000; and, further, that he intended to thus secure to her, by means of the mortgage, the amount of his debt and the amount of his gift. As a consequence, the referee held and declared the mortgage to be a valid lien on plaintiffs' lots in the sum of $5,000, with interest from date. It is this finding and conclusion which we shall consider, principally, as was the case in the district court when passing upon the motion for a new trial.

It was contended by the plaintiffs that the mortgage did not constitute a lien for any sum whatsoever upon their property for two reasons: first, it was never delivered to the mortgagee; and, second, that, as the note therein described was not made by the mortgagor, and the indebtedness therein mentioned never existed, the instrument itself must necessarily be invalid and of no effect. To render the mortgage effectual there must have been an actual or constructive delivery of the same to the mortgagee, prior to the death of the mortgagor. There was no actual delivery in this case; but the mortgagor, Lennon, owed Miss Libby, the woman to whom he was engaged, on account of money which she had sent him to invest, and which he may have used in the purchase of the property in question. She was

Delivery in escrow.

Where an instrument has been deposited as a writing or escrow of the grantor, it does not become a deed, and no estate passes, until the event has happened upon which it is to be delivered to the grantee, or until the delivery by the depository to the grantee. Schmidt v. Deegan, 69 Wis. 300; Calhoun County v. American Emigrant Co. 98 U. S. 124, 23 L. ed. 323.

A deed cannot be delivered in escrow to the grantee. Darling v. Butler (N. Y.) 10 L. R. A. 469, and note.

Where upon an exchange of lands both plaintiff and defendant execute deeds and place them with a third person in escrow, to be delivered upon conditions as to the title, which are not performed, the depository is justified in redelivering the defendant's deed to him. Hayden v. Meeks (Ark.) Nov. 22, 1890.

A real-estate agent is not necessarily incapacitated by his agency from acting as the custodian of an escrow between his principal and the purchaser. McLaughlin v. Wheeler (S. Dak.) Jan. 30, 1891. See Cincinnati, W. & Z. R. Co. v. Hilt, 18 Ohio St. 254.

The authority of the custodian of a deed delivered as an escrow need not be in writing. Cannon v. Handley, 72 Cal. 123.

Where a married woman joined with her husband in executing a deed, and intrusted it to him for delivery, he had authority to arrange the details of receiving payment and consummating the delivery. The placing it in escrow was a step in the delivery, and the wife's signature to the stipulation making the escrow was unnecessary. Hughes v. Thistlewood, 40 Kan. 232.

Where a deed which is delivered in escrow is afterwards delivered to the vendee, the fact that such delivery and lease did not take place until after the time provided in the preliminary agreement for such offense is immaterial. McDonald v. Huff, 77 Cal. 279.

Where a deed remains in escrow until the first payment is made, and is then delivered as the deed of the parties, this is equivalent to a mortgage to secure the first payment. Brown v. Gilman, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 255, 4 L. ed. 564.

A deed cannot be made in escrow by any other declarations of the grantor than are made at the time of signing and executing it. Blight v. Schenck, 10 Pa. 225, 51 Am. Dec. 481.

Effect of delivery in escrow.

A deed delivered in escrow cannot be revoked by 12 L. R. A.

the grantor. Cannon v. Handley, 72 Cal. 123; Millet v. Parker, 2 Met. (Ky.) 603.

Upon performance by a grantee of the condition upon which a deed is delivered in escrow, the depository becomes the custodian of the grantee, and his possession is the possession of the latter. Cannon v. Handley, supra; Shirley v. Ayres, 14 Ohio, 303.

The destruction or detention of the deed by the grantor, after being placed in the hands of the trustee, cannot divest grantee's title. Regan v. Howe, 121 Mass. 426; Foster v. Mansfield, 3 Met. 412; Jacobs v. Alexander, 19 Barb. 245; Sorugham v. Wood, 15 Wend. 546; Moore v. Hazelton, 9 Allen, 103.

A deed delivered in escrow does not by delivery to the grantee after the grantor's death take effect by relation, as against a devise of the land by the grantor. Chadwick v. Tatem, 9 Mont. 354.

Delivery by act of recording.

A deed may be delivered by the grantor's having it recorded, if his purpose be to effectuate a delivery. Vaughan v. Godman, 1 West. Rep. 547, 103 Ind. 499, citing Taylor v. McClure, 25 Ind. 39; Somers v. Pumphrey, 24 Ind. 231; Mallett v. Page, 8 Ind. 364; Tallman v. Cooke, 39 Iowa, 402. See Ward v. Small (Ky.) 12 Ky. L. Rep. 55; Younge v. Guilbeau, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 636, 18 L. ed. 233.

A deed executed and recorded, if not delivered, will convey no title. McGraw v. McGraw, 4 New Eng. Rep. 415, 79 Me. 257; Hill v. McNichol, 6 New Eng. Rep. 445, 30 Me. 209; Stone v. French, 37 Kan. 145.

The execution and registration of a deed, and delivery of it to the register for that purpose, do not vest the title in the grantee, unless the register is his agent to receive it. Parmelee v. Simpson, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 81, 18 L. ed. 542; Maynard v. Maynard, 10 Mass. 456; Samson v. Thornton, 3 Met. 231; Younge v. Guilbeau, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 641, 18 L. ed. 233.

The delivery of a deed in which the grantees were numerous, to the clerk to be recorded, may be considered, if no condition is annexed, to be a delivery to the grantees. Tompkins v. Wheeler, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 106, 10 L. ed. 903.

Presumption of delivery.

Possession by the grantee of a deed duly executed and acknowledged is presumptive evidence of its delivery. Scott v. Scott, 14 West. Rep. 343, 95 Mo. 800; Green v. Yarnall, 6 Mo. 533; Ward v. Dougherty, 75 Cal. 240; Blair v. Howell, 68 Iowa, 619;

some distance from him, residing in the State of Massachusetts. With much care he prepared with his own hands a mortgage, in which she was named as mortgagee, upon this and other real property, to secure the payment of a note, never executed, for a much larger sum than the amount of his debt. A few hours before he killed himself, and, undoubtedly, in contemplation of the act, he took this instrument to the proper office, and gave it to the register of deeds, with directions to record the same at his expense. When he placed the mortgage in the hands of the officer for record it was clearly his intention to do all that he could, under the circumstances, towards delivering it, to put it beyond his own control, for the benefit of the mortgagee. No particular ceremony is essential to the delivery of such an instrument. It may consist in an act without words, or in words without any act. Manual possession of a deed by the grantee is not necessary. Whether there has been a delivery to him depends upon the intent of the grantor; and, if such an intent is manifest, de-

Den v. Farlee, 21 N. J. L. 280; Black v. Shreve, 18 N. J. Eq. 455; Benson v. Woolverton, 15 N. J. Eq. 158; Brown v. Brown, 38 N. J. Eq. 653; Dunn v. Games, 1 McLean, 523; Butrick v. Tilton, 2 New Eng. Rep. 248. 141 Mass. 93; Games v. Dunn, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 323, 10 L. ed. 476; Sticard v. Davis, 81 U. S. 6 Pet. 124, 8 L. ed. 342.

But such presumption is rebutted where, after the asserted delivery, the property is treated in all respects by grantor and grantee as the land of the grantor. Scott v. Scott, supra.

Where a grantee is in possession of a deed which upon the face of it is regularly executed, and has had it recorded, the presumption is that it was duly delivered. Hanrick v. Neely, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 354, 19 L. ed. 947; Carver v. Jackson, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 1, 84, 7 L. ed. 761, 790; Ward v. Lewis, 4 Pick. 520.

Where a deed was made by a father to his children, the presumption of delivery thereof, arising from their possession of the deed, is not rebutted by proof showing that the deed was not recorded until after the grantor's death, and that (under a reservation in the deed) he remained in possession during his life, and that the land was assessed to him and the taxes paid by him, and that he, after the date and acknowledgment of the deed, offered the land for sale. Blair v. Howell, supra. See Stewart v. Stewart, 50 Wis. 443.

There is a strong implication that a deed duly executed, found among papers of grantee after his death, has been delivered. Griffin v. Griffin, 125 Ill. 480.

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the production of a deed by the grantee is prima facie evidence of its delivery. Andrews v. Dyer, 3 New Eng. Rep. 223, 78 Me. 427, citing Maynard v. Maynard, 10 Mass. 456; Hatch v. Haskins, 17 Me. 301; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 297.

But no presumption of delivery arises where a deed running to Mercy A. is produced by Melissa A., whose deceased husband was the grantor. Andrews v. Dyer, supra.

Possession of an unregistered deed does not raise a presumption of its delivery, but it is a fact from which the jury may infer a delivery in the absence of rebutting evidence. Tuttle v. Rainey, 98 N. C. 613.

Presumption as to time of delivery.

Where a document purporting to be a duly acknowledged deed, with regular evidence of its execution, upon its face, is found in the hands of the grantee, or if such a deed is found upon the proper records, a presumption arises that it was delivered at the time it bears date, or at some time prior to the date of its acknowledgment. Vaughan v. Godman, 94 Ind. 191; Wheeler v. Single, 62 Wis. 380; Wallace v. Bordell, 97 N. Y. 13; People v. Snyder, 41 N. Y. 397; Canandarqua Academy v. McKechnie, 90 N. Y. 618; Knolls v. Barnhart, 71 N. Y. 474; McCurdy's App. 65 Pa. 290; Abb. Tr. Ev. 694; Steph. Dig. Ev. 154; Wood, Pr. Ev. 241.

In the absence of proof to the contrary, it will be presumed that a deed was delivered at its date. Purdy v. Coar, 12 Cent. Rep. 629, 109 N. Y. 448; Ward 12 L. R. A.

v. Dougherty, 75 Cal. 240; Cal. Civ. Code, § 1055; United States v. Le Baron, 60 U. S. 19 How. 73, 12 L. ed. 523; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 297; Van Rensselaer v. Vickery, 3 Lana. 59; Elsey v. Metcalf, 1 Denio, 322; Harris v. Norton, 18 Barb. 264.

Where there is no evidence beyond what is furnished by the instrument itself, showing the date of the delivery of the deed, the legal presumption must prevail that it was delivered on the day of its date. Walker v. Rand, 181 Ill. 27, citing Hardin v. Crate, 78 Ill. 538; Hardin v. Osborne, 60 Ill. 96; Deiminger v. McConnell, 41 Ill. 227; Jayne v. Gregg, 42 Ill. 413; Darst v. Bates, 61 Ill. 439.

But this presumption may be removed by evidence that it was delivered on some subsequent day. United States v. Le Baron, supra.

When a delivery on a subsequent day is shown, the deed speaks on that subsequent day, and not on the day of its date. United States v. Le Baron, supra.

Under the Maryland Act of 1766, a deed signed, sealed and delivered is complete, and will take effect as of that date, if subsequently acknowledged and enrolled, without regard to an intervening Bankrupt Act. Wood v. Owings, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 229, 2 L. ed. 94.

The deed itself as evidence of delivery.

The delivery of a deed complete on its face to the grantee is absolute, whatever conditions may be orally annexed to qualify or postpone its operation. Hargrave v. Melbourne, 35 Ala. 270.

A notary's seal is not essential to delivery. Robinson v. Robinson, 3 West. Rep. 849, 116 Ill. 360.

That a deed contains the words "signed, sealed and delivered," is not evidence of delivery. Hill v. McNichol, 6 New Eng. Rep. 445, 80 Me. 203.

The certificate of a proper officer, made under the Statute, that the grantor signed, sealed and delivered the deed or mortgage as his voluntary act and deed, is cogent evidence of delivery. Den v. Farlee, 21 N. J. L. 285.

Parol evidence as to delivery.

Delivery of deed may be proved by parol. Coia v. Coia, 24 S. C. 597.

So, it is always competent to show by parol that there has not been a delivery. Stephens v. Buffalo & N. Y. C. R. Co. 20 Barb. 536; Roberts v. Jackson, 1 Wend. 478; Clark v. Gifford, 10 Wend. 310; Gilbert v. North American F. Ins. Co. 23 Wend. 43; The Lady Superior v. McNamara, 3 Barb. Ch. 375, 5 L. ed. 599.

Where the only act looking toward a delivery is the recording of the deed, the effect of such recording is governed by the intention of the party recording, and is shown by what he said to the register of deeds when he left the instrument with him for record; and what he said is part of the res gestae and admissible to explain the character of his intent. Stevens v. Castel, 5 West. Rep. 724, 63 Mich. 111, citing Felt v. Amidon, 43 Wis. 467; Lund v. Tyngsborough, 9 Cush. 36.

Grantor's declarations in disparagement of grantee's title, in presence of the grantee, are admissible livery for record, although not known by the grantee, is, if followed by his assent,—as was the case here,—a good delivery. Stevens v. Hatch, 6 Minn. 64 (Gil. 19); Gaston v. Merriam, 38 Minn. 271; Conlan v. Grace, 36 Minn. 276; Nazro v. Ware, 38 Minn. 448.

The finding of the referee as to delivery of the mortgage was abundantly supported by the testimony. But there was no note of any description executed by Mr. Lennon. A note corresponding with that described in the mortgage, had such a one been made, might have been evidence of his intent to present the amount thereof to Miss Libby, or of his intent to give to her the difference between the amount of his indebtedness and the sum of $5,-000. It may have been, as determined by the referee, that Mr. Lennon intended this difference as an outright gift to Miss Libby, but there was no evidence of such an intent. As was said by the court below when granting the motion for a new trial, such a purpose rested upon the question of delivery of the deed (Spencer v. Robbins, 3 West. Rep. 702, 106 Ind. 580); but such declarations made in the absence of the grantee are not admissible. Spencer v. Robbins, supra, citing McSweeney v. McMillen, 36 Ind. 236.

Evidence that an attorney, at the request of the grantee, prepared a deed, which was signed and acknowledged before him as notary, and handed it to the grantor, who retained it till the death of the grantee, is not sufficient to constitute delivery. McElroy v. Hiner, 133 Ill. 156.

Where a deed was made, and the grantor said that the land belonged to the grantee, but the deed never was recorded, and was found among the papers of the grantor after his death, there was no delivery. Maddox v. Gray, 75 Ga. 452.

Where grantee had actual possession of the deed, up to a short time before his death, and was in full possession of the land, and there is evidence tending to prove that he purchased and paid for the land, and that the deed was properly in his possession until his father obtained possession of it and destroyed it, this is sufficient evidence of delivery of the deed. Robinson v. Robinson, 3 West. Rep. 349, 116 Ill. 250. See Teller v. Brower, 14 Or. 405.

Acceptance by grantee.

A deed, to become effective, must be either delivered to the grantee or his agent, or such circumstances must be shown as will raise a reasonable presumption of its acceptance by the grantee. Ward v. Small (Ky.), 12 Ky. L. Rep. 58; Moore v. Flynn (Ill.) Nov. 5, 1890.

Acceptance by the grantee will be presumed from his conduct, without an express acceptance. Ward v. Small, supra.

Where a grant is to a child, by way of gift, and is beneficial in effect, acceptance of the deed will be presumed although retained by the grantor. Vaughan v. Godman, 1 West. Rep. 547, 108 Ind. 490, citing Cecil v. Beaver, 28 Iowa. 241, 4 Am. Rep. 174; Spencer v. Carr, 45 N. Y. 406, 6 Am. Rep. 112; Guard v. Bradley, 7 Ind. 600; Squires v. Summers, 85 Ind. 252; Bryan v. Wash, 7 Ill. 557; Reed v. Douthitt, 62 Ill. 348; Rivard v. Walker, 39 Ill. 413; 3 Washb. Real Prop. 4th ed. 234; Jones v. Loveless, 99 Ind. 317; Fitzgerald v. Goff, Id. 28; Bremmerman v. Jennings, 101 Ind. 253.

Where a deed from a woman to her daughter is delivered to the daughter's husband, and her grantor announces an intention to convey to her the property, a presumption of acceptance arises. Crain v. Wright, 114 N. Y. 307.

It seems that when a grantor, contracting to convey land in unequal proportions to several grantees as co-tenants, delivers a deed thereof to one of them, it must be presumed that he delivered it as a conveyance to all, and unless all accepted there was no delivery. Smith v. Cole, 12 Cent. Rep. 774, 109 N. Y. 436.

A delivery of a deed to one who had no express authority to receive it and was not empowered to act as the grantee's agent is sufficient where the grantee subsequently ratified the action of the agent by accepting. Ward v. Small (Ky.), 12 Ky. L. Rep. 58.

Recording by grantee.

Where a deed is legally executed and regularly recorded by the grantee, delivery will be presumed where the transaction would otherwise stand without rational explanation, unless such presumption is repelled by other proofs. Collins v. Collins, 45 N. J. Eq. 513.

When a deed is delivered in the execution of the contract, with the intention that it shall be operative when the grantee approves of the title, he has the right to put the deed on record, on his approving of it and tendering the consideration money. Ryan v. United States, 126 U. S. 68, 34 L. ed. 447.

Recording a deed is equivalent to a delivery thereof, in the absence of any fraud on the grantor. Levy v. Cox, 22 Fla. 546.

Mortgage; sufficiency of description of mortgaged premises.

An insufficient description in a mortgage will not itself render it void; its office is not to identify the property, but to furnish means for identification. Thomson v. Madison Bldg. & Aid Assn., 1 West. Rep. 263, 108 Ind. 279.

Parol evidence is admissible to identify mortgaged property. Rubey v. Missouri Coal & Min. Co., 3 West. Rep. 758, 21 Mo. App. 159; Jones, Chat. Mort. § 64; Cake v. Cake, 127 Pa. 400.

Literal exactness in describing the title to be secured by a mortgage is not required. Morris v. Murray, 32 Ky. 36.

It is sufficient if the description be correct, as far as it goes, and full enough to direct attention to the sources of full and correct information. Ibid.; Jones, Mort. §§ 70, 34.

If the description be sufficient to identify the property, it is sufficient. Winchell v. Coney, 2 New Eng. Rep. 327, 54 Conn. 24; Rochat v. Emmett, 35 Minn. 420; Worthington v. Hylier, 4 Mass. 196.

A wrong description does not affect the rights of the parties where there is no question as to what property was intended to be mortgaged. Koenig v. Schmitz, 71 Iowa, 175.

A mistake in the number of the block in which property is situated is not sufficient to affect the validity of a mortgage or a sale of the property thereunder, where it could not have misled anyone. Cake v. Cake, 127 Pa. 400.

Where the lands conveyed by a mortgage are therein described as "320 acres of land known as the Middlebrooks Place, where the said H lived last year, and where T now lives," the mortgage is not void for uncertainty. Tranum v. Wilkinson, 61 Ala. 408.

A mortgagor cannot be heard to complain of an indefinite description of the mortgaged property, whatever might be the effect of a sale under the description. Graham v. Stewart, 63 Cal. 374, citing Whitney v. Buckman, 13 Cal. 538; Tryon v. Sutton, Id. 430.

Where a party points out a specific parcel of land to another, and represents that it is described in a particular way, the party to whom the statement is made has a right to rely upon it. McCasland v. Aetna L. Ins. Co., 6 West. Rep. 274, 108 Ind. 405.

wholly in conjecture. The gift, if really contemplated, was never made; if intended, it was unexecuted, and hence invalid. But from the facts which did appear on the trial it might fairly be assumed that, although the mortgagor failed to make a note corresponding with that described by him, or for the amount of his actual indebtedness, he intended to secure his creditor for that amount, whatever it may have been. A note for the amount he owed, or even for a greater sum, would not have added to his indebtedness as such. It would have been evidence of it only. And if it satisfactorily appeared that, when giving the mortgage, it was the purpose of the maker to secure his debt, the non-execution of a note, or the execution of a note for a larger or smaller sum, would not, in the absence of fraud, invalidate the security. The validity of a mortgage does not depend upon the description of the debt, nor upon the form of the indebtedness; it depends rather upon the existence of the debt it was given to secure. It may be valid without any note or bond, although it purports to secure a note or bond, and substantially describes it. Jones, Mort. § 858, and cases cited in notes. The true state of the indebtedness need not be disclosed by the instrument itself, but, in cases free from fraud, may be shown by parol. In such cases the validity of the mortgage is not affected by the fact that it was given for a larger sum than that actually due, or that its condition misrepresents the obligation or liability in fact secured or intended to be secured. Nastro v. Wars, supra, and cases cited.

To the extent indicated—that is, to the amount actually due the mortgagees when the mortgage was executed—it was and is a valid lien upon the real estate covered thereby. Had this amount been found by the referee, so that a judgment on such finding could have been ordered, or had he simply declared that to this extent the mortgage was a lien, leaving the amount to be subsequently ascertained in an action brought by defendant Fletcher to foreclose or by plaintiffs to redeem, and, in addition, ordered judgment for the defendants,—as he did,—a new trial would have been unnecessary. But the referee erred in finding as a fact that the mortgage was given not only to secure the amount of Lennon's indebtedness to Miss Libby, but also to secure to her as a gift the sum in excess of the indebtedness up to $5,000, and also erred in his conclusion of law that to the amount of $5,000, with interest, the instrument in question was a valid mortgage on plaintiffs' property. If permitted to stand without objection, such a finding would conclude the plaintiffs upon the fact, and on the conclusion of law, as found by the referee, judgment could be entered fixing the amount of the lien. The question would then be res adjudicata. The district court was correct in granting the plaintiffs a new trial as to defendant Fletcher, the sole owner and holder of the mortgage. The defendant Gilfillan claims, however, that as to him the order must be reversed. In his answer he had alleged ownership in fee to an undivided half of one of these lots, and had disclaimed all interest in the balance of the property. When proving their case plaintiffs made no attempt to show that they were the owners of this undivided half, and, immediately upon resting, stipulated that it was owned in fee by Gilfillan. The referee so found, ordering judgment in his favor as to an undivided half, and no one seems to question the correctness of this finding and conclusion. But, notwithstanding this, the plaintiffs' motion was for a new trial as to both defendants, and it was this motion which was granted. The motion as to Gilfillan may have been inadvertently made by counsel for respondents, and we have no doubt that the court below overlooked the situation with respect to him, but the fact remains that to avoid a new trial he has been obliged to appeal from the order. It was not incumbent upon him to ask that the order be modified by the district court.

As to the defendant Fletcher it is affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Louis WETZLER, Respt.,

v.

Pauline A. DUFFY, Appt.

(....Wis.....)

1. The loss by fire of a house on land in the actual possession of a vendee as owner, he having secured part of the purchase money by mortgage and paid the balance, must be borne by him, although he holds under a defective deed, as he is the equitable owner of the premises.
2. Upon the correction by the court of a deed which defectively describes premises, the equitable title to which is in the vendee, his legal title relates back to its execution and delivery.

3. Unless a party calls the attention of the court to a matter of fact upon which he desires a separate finding he cannot, on appeal, avail himself of the neglect of the court to make such finding, if the evidence sustains the findings made and is not sufficient to require additional ones as matter of law.

4. It will be presumed upon appeal that the court found against a counterclaim if it omitted to set out any finding in regard to it and the evidence clearly justifies a finding against it.

(November 25, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Ashland County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to reform a deed and foreclose a mortgage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cole & O'Keefe, for appellant:

Where the loss occurs before delivery of the title deed,—and it matters not that an erroneous deed was delivered, as vendee is entitled to a perfect deed properly describing the premises as well as one with all the necessary essentials according to agreement of sale,—the loss falls upon the vendor.

Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514.

Defendant had a right to have the issues raised on her counterclaim decided, and if the defendant would have the right to recover back the purchase money paid, the same would be a good counterclaim.

Thompson v. Gould, 37 Mass. 184.

If the defendant after the property was destroyed owed the balance of the purchase money, $700 therein sued for, there was at the time such sum became due a failure of consideration and a part of defendant's title had failed, and the same would be an absolute defense to a suit for such purchase money.

The defendant is not required to accept the deed as the value of the property is reduced and changed, and she is entitled to recover back the purchase money.

Boone, Real Prop. p. 483; Wells v. Calnan, Thompson v. Gould, Bend v. Ruckman and Wicks v. Bowman, supra.

Messrs. Sleight & Foster for respondent.

Taylor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in this case are substantially as follows: On the 14th of May, 1887, the plaintiff agreed to convey to the said defendant a certain lot of land situate in Ashland County, described as follows: "Commencing at the northwest corner of lot No. one (1), in block No. six (6), of the Village of Hurley, according to the recorded plat thereof; thence east twenty-five (25) feet; thence south ninety (90) feet; thence west twenty-five (25) feet; and thence north ninety (90) feet to the place of beginning,"—for the consideration of $2,500 agreed to be paid by the defendant. That on the same day the plaintiff executed a deed of conveyance to the said defendant, which both parties supposed contained a correct description of the property sold to the defendant; but, in fact, the description was imperfect, and does not describe the land sold and intended to be conveyed. The description in the deed is as follows: "The following described real estate situated in the County of Ashland, and State of Wisconsin,—to wit: commencing at the northwest corner of lot number one (1), in block number six (6), in the Village of Hurley, according to the recorded plat thereof; running thence west twenty-five (25) feet; thence south ninety (90) feet; thence east twenty-five (25) feet; thence north ninety (90) feet to the original point of beginning." Said deed was recorded in the proper recorder's office, and on the same day the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff a mortgage upon the property sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, in which mortgage the property is correctly described, to secure the payment of $1,000, part of the purchase money. The complaint alleges the nonpayment of a part of the money due upon the mortgage, and asks judgment, first to correct the description in the deed from the plaintiff to the defendant, and for a judgment to foreclose the said mortgage. The answer admits all the material allegations of the complaint, and further admits that, supposing the plaintiff's deed had conveyed to her the land she purchased, she went into the possession of the same, and paid $300 of the sum secured by said mortgage; that on the 27th day of June, A. D. 1887, a fire broke out in the frame store building situate on said lot, and it was wholly destroyed by fire, the defendant having no insurance thereon, thereby destroying the greater part of the value of said lot to the defendant. It is admitted that this frame building was on the lot when the plaintiff agreed to convey the same to the defendant, and at the time the deed was in fact made, and the mortgage back to the plaintiff given to secure the $1,000, part of the purchase price. The defendant also alleges in her answer that, at the time she purchased the lot of the plaintiff, the building on said lot was insured by the plaintiff for the sum of $300, in a reliable insurance company; and that he agreed to transfer said insurance policy to the defendant, for the sum of $40, to be paid by the defendant; and that the plaintiff neglected and refused to transfer said insurance policy to the defendant, to her damage. The defendant also alleges a refusal on the part of the plaintiff to make a good deed of conveyance of the property actually purchased by her, and sets up, as a counterclaim, a demand for the money actually paid by her upon such purchase. The action was tried by the court, and, after hearing the testimony offered by the respective parties, the court decided in favor of the plaintiff and gave judgment reforming the deed and for a foreclosure of the mortgage. The defendant excepted to the findings of fact and conclusions of law. After a careful reading of the testimony, we think it very clear that the findings of fact are fully sustained by the evidence, and the conclusions of law, and the judgment thereon in favor of the plaintiff, are clearly right.

The learned counsel for the defendant contends that the judgment is erroneous, because it clearly appears from the findings and the evidence that, before the commencement of this action, and before a perfect deed had been given by the plaintiff to the defendant, for the real estate in dispute, the building situate thereon had been burned; and so the plaintiff could not make a perfect title to the premises sold to the defendant, the house burned being a very material part of the lot sold. He argues that when a party agrees to convey real estate to another for a fixed price, and when a considerable portion of such price is paid for the buildings situate thereon, and such buildings are destroyed by fire, without the fault of the purchaser, before the title is conveyed to him, he may refuse to take a conveyance, and recover the purchase money already paid; and to this proposition he cites Thompson v. Gould, 20 Pick. 134, and Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514.

We think this case is clearly distinguishable from the cases cited. In those cases the buildings on the premises were destroyed before the time for making the deed had arrived, and it does not appear in the case last cited that the purchaser had taken possession under his contract. In the case at bar, the contract was a sale to be paid for on delivery of a deed, and the deed was to be delivered immediately. A deed was delivered which was supposed to convey the land to the defendant, and she took actual possession, as owner thereof, gave back a mortgage to secure part of the purchase money, the other part having been paid in cash. We think it very clear that, when this imperfect deed was given, the purchase price paid, and possession taken of the property intended to be conveyed by the defendant, the whole equitable title, at least to the land, vested in the defendant; and while such equitable title was vested in the defendant, the house was destroyed by fire. Upon its destruction the defendant did not seek to avoid her contract, but rebuilt on the lot, and continued in the actual possession of the same up to the time of the commencement of this action. Under such a state of facts, we think the defendant must be considered the owner of the premises at the time of the fire, and the loss must fall on her. Whether we would feel bound to follow the decisions of the court of Massachusetts, had the defendant been in possession of the lot under a contract for a deed to be executed at some future time, and before that time had arrived the house had been destroyed by fire, without the fault of either party, need not be determined in this case. For all practical purposes, the defendant was the owner of the house and lot when the fire occurred, and the Massachusetts cases place their decision upon the ground that the actual owner must stand the loss. In addition to this, when the court by its judgment corrected the deed, the legal estate became vested in the defendant from the time of the execution and delivery of the deed.

The learned counsel for the appellant urges another point as error, viz.: That the court did not make any findings upon his counterclaim for damages for a breach of contract on the part of plaintiff to transfer to her the policy of insurance he held upon the building at the time the same was burned. We have looked into the testimony which bears upon that question, and think it is entirely insufficient to sustain a finding thereon in favor of the defendant. But the counsel for the defendant insists that, if it be admitted that the evidence is insufficient to sustain a finding in favor of the plaintiff, still, it was error for the court not to make a finding on the question. The exceptions of the defendant are not sufficient to raise that question in this court. The record does not show that he called the attention of the court to the matter, or that he asked the court to make a finding on that point. All he did was to except to the findings because there was no finding on that question. These exceptions are not made in court, and probably never came to the knowledge of the court until he was asked to sign the bill of exceptions in the case.

The rule was established in this court in Wilkinson v. Wilkinson, 59 Wis. 557, 560; Barry v. Schmidt, 57 Wis. 172; Wrigglesworth v. Wrigglesworth, 45 Wis. 255-257; Mead v. 12 L. R. A.

Chippewa County Supra, 41 Wis. 205; Williams v. Stevens Point Lumber Co., 72 Wis. 487.—that, if a party to an action desires any particular finding of fact, he must call the attention of the court to the matter of fact upon which he desires a separate finding; otherwise, he cannot avail himself of the neglect of the court to make such finding. This rule is only applicable to a case where the testimony sustains the findings made by the court, and there is not sufficient evidence in the case to require, as a matter of law, a finding different from those found by the court upon some other material matter. In this case, the court having omitted to find for either party on the counterclaim made by the defendant in her answer, and the evidence being of such a character as would have clearly justified the court in finding against such counterclaim, we must infer, from his omission to make a special finding on that point, that he found against the defendant's claim. We think the case was fairly tried, and that the judgment is right.

The judgment of the Circuit is affirmed.

STATE of Wisconsin, ex rel. Patrick GRADY, Appt.,

CHICAGO, MADISON & NORTHERN R. CO., Resp't.

(....Wis....)

1. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel a railroad company to perform its statutory duty to construct a farm crossing.

NOTE.—Mandamus to compel performance of corporate duties.

Mandamus is the appropriate remedy to compel a railway company to perform the public duties required of it by its charter, and imposed on it by law. Railroad Comrs. v. Portland & O. Cent. R. Co. 68 Me. 209; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Wisdom, 5 Heak. 125. See State v. New Haven & N. Co. 41 Conn. 184.

Duty of railroad company to fence its tracks.

The Minnesota Statute requiring railroads to be fenced is not a law for line or partition fences. Smith v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 37 Minn. 103; Gillam v. Sioux City & St. P. R. Co. 26 Minn. 223.

The Revised Statutes of Wisconsin as amended, requiring railroad companies to fence their tracks, and making them absolutely liable for damages occasioned by their failure to do so, is valid, and it excludes the defense of contributory negligence. Quackenbush v. Wisconsin & M. R. Co. 71 Wis. 472.

The neglect of a railroad company to properly fence its track is sufficient negligence to make the company liable for animals killed by a train. Talbot v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. R. Co. (Mich.) July 2, 1890; Flint & P. M. R. Co. v. Lull, 28 Mich. 510; Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Southwick, 30 Mich. 444.

Although the fencing of a track is not imposed upon a railroad company as a duty, yet the fact that the track is unfenced of itself conclusively establishes negligence of the company, where stock is killed or injured thereon. Hindman v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 17 Or. 614.

A railroad company is liable in damages for injury to stock through its negligence, where the owner contributed to the injury only by permitting

2. Neither the right to maintain actions for penalties or to file a bill in equity for a mandatory injunction, nor the fact that an indictment will lie because of the refusal of a railroad company to make a farm crossing, constitutes such an adequate remedy at law as to bar a writ of mandamus to compel the construction of a crossing.

3. A writ of mandamus is properly directed to a corporation in its corporate name.

(March 17, 1891.)

APPEAL by relator from an order of the Circuit Court for Green County quashing an alternative writ of mandamus directing respondent to construct a farm crossing on relator's land or show cause why it should not do so. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. B. Dunwiddie, for appellant:

The respondent Company having neglected to construct the crossing as required by statute, the relator was warranted in instituting mandamus proceedings on the authority of general principles, as adjudicated by the common-law courts.

Massrs. B. J. Stevens and P. J. Clawson, for respondent:

The Statute is designed to protect trains on railroads as much as domestic animals straying upon them. Its object is to protect the public generally.

The discretion of determining what shall be "suitable and convenient" crossings is one for the Company, subject to review by the court.

Jones v. Seligman, 81 N. Y. 191.

For aught that appears in the petition, it may well be that the cut in question was so deep and wide as to render the cost of a bridge, such as would be proper to protect the public as well as the cattle of the appellant from danger, greater than either portion of the farm, and, hence, unwarranted, as a suitable crossing.

In such case the failure to fence will be considered the proximate cause of the injury. Sullivan v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. (Or.) June 10, 1890.

Duty of railroad companies to fence tracks. See notes to Gallagher v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (Conn.) 5 L. R. A. 737; Donnegan v. Erhardt (N. Y.) 7 L. R. A. 527.

Constitutionality of statutes.

A statute making the failure of a railroad company to fence its track conclusive proof of negligence, and making it liable for stock killed in consequence of such failure, is not obnoxious to the constitutional provisions requiring due process of law and the equal protection of the laws. Sullivan v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. supra; Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Dacres (Wash.) March 8, 1890; Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Smalley (Wash.) March 8, 1890.

It is only where a duty is specific and plainly imposed upon a corporation that the court may act by mandamus. People v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 6 Cent. Rep. 30, 104 N. Y. 33; People v. Dutchess & C. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 152; People v. Boston & A. R. Co. 70 N. Y. 569; People v. Rochester & S. L. R. Co. 76 N. Y. 294; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. People, 9 West. Rep. 167, 120 Ill. 200.

The erection of a station-house, or its enlargement, not being a specific duty prescribed by statute, courts cannot enforce its performance by mandamus. People v. Roma, W. & O. R. Co. 4 Cent. Rep. 167, 103 N. Y. 93.

Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel a company to construct its fences in compliance with the Statute (Ohio & M. R. Co. v. People, 11 West. Rep. 875, 121 Ill. 483); or to build a bridge. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. People, 9 West. Rep. 167, 120 Ill. 200; New Orleans, M. & T. R. Co. v. Mississippi, 113 U. S. 12, 23 L. ed. 619; People v. Boston & A. R. Co. 70 N. Y. 569.

Mandamus lies to compel a company to operate its road as a continuous line, to compel it to run daily trains, and, where there is a statute expressly requiring it, to compel a stoppage of at least two of its trains each day at a particular station. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. People, 9 West. Rep. 167, 120 Ill. 200; 12 L. R. A.

Union Pac. R. Co. v. Hall, 91 U. S. 343, 23 L. ed. 423; Re Brunswick etc. R. Co. 1 Puga. & B. (N. H.) 697; Com. v. Eastern R. Co. 103 Mass. 254.

So it lies to compel a company to grade its tracks and crossings, and construct its road across a stream, so as not to interfere with navigation. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. People, 9 West. Rep. 167, 120 Ill. 200; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. People, 56 Ill. 325; State v. North Eastern R. Co. 9 Rich. L. 247.

But mandamus will not be granted in any case where it is clear it would prove unavailing; hence, a railroad company cannot be compelled to repair its road and put it in safe condition for passengers when the company has neither the funds nor the means of raising them. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. People, 9 West. Rep. 167, 120 Ill. 200. See People v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 55 Ill. 95; People v. Lieb, 85 Ill. 424; People v. Trustees of Schools, 86 Ill. 613; Cristman v. Peck, 90 Ill. 150; People v. Hatch, 38 Ill. 9.

A mandamus on the ground of a statutory duty must be to compel the very duty enjoined by the statute. People v. Emigration Comrs. 22 How. Pr. 291.

In such proceedings, where the question is one of public right, it is sufficient for the relator to show that he is a citizen of the county and as such is interested in the execution of the laws. State v. Grace (Or.) 81 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 408; State v. Ware, 13 Or. 380.

Rule applied in other cases.

Mandamus will issue against the cashier of a bank or other officer having the custody of the books; and the bank, in its corporate capacity, is not a proper party defendant on a petition to compel a bank to permit access to and inspection of its books. Winter v. Baldwin (Ala.) April 30, 1890; People v. Throop, 13 Wend. 153; People v. Mott, 1 How. Pr. 247.

Mandamus will issue to restore to membership in an incorporated society one suspended for failure to pay a penalty not authorized by the constitution or by laws. Erd v. Bavarian Nat. A. & L. Asso. 11 West. Rep. 171, 67 Mich. 223.

Or, where a member has been expelled without being given the opportunities for defense provided

The Freeport road runs along on the east side of the two parts of relator's tract separated by the railroad, and connects the same, and it is in this road, where it crosses the railroad, that the highway bridge over the deep cut is constructed. The appellant's land extends to the center of this road, and hence to the center of the bridge. May not this bridge, situate in half-part lengthwise upon his own land, be, under the circumstances, the "suitable and convenient" farm crossing of the Statute?

See Kimball v. Kenosha, 4 Wis. 321; Kneeland v. Van Valkenburgh, 48 Wis. 434; Hammond v. McLachlan, 1 Sandf. 323; Mariner v. Schulte, 18 Wis. 693; Arnold v. Elmore, 16 Wis. 509; Gove v. White, 20 Wis. 425; Norcross v. Griffiths, 65 Wis. 599; White v. Godfrey, 97 Mass. 472.

The appellant had an ample and adequate remedy at law, and also in equity as well, and was under no necessity for resorting to mandamus.

State v. Washington County Supra, 2 Pinn. 553; State v. Fond Du Lac, 42 Wis. 287; State v. Joint School Dist. 65 Wis. 631; High, Extr. Legal Rem. §§ 42, 238.

The Statute gives to the owner the personal right to have constructed, in proper places, farm crossings, and provides a method for enforcing the right by suit to recover the extraordinary penalty of $10 for each passing locomotive; and this recovery can, of course, be had only at law. The rule is settled that where the Statute "confers a right and prescribes the remedy for its enforcement, such remedy must be pursued to the exclusion of all others."

Burns v. Milwaukee & M. R. Co. 9 Wis. 455; Bohlman v. Green Bay & L. P. R. Co. 30 Wis. 105; Andrews v. Farmers L. & T. Co. 23 Wis. 288; Sherman v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 40 Wis. 645; Hanlin v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 61 Wis. 515; State v. Milwaukee, 20 Wis. 87.

In addition, there is the remedy by indictment.

People v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 74 N. Y. 302; Gear v. C. O. & D. R. Co. 43 Iowa, 83.

Not only has the appellant legal remedies which are adequate and ample, but the remedy in equity is far more appropriate and more efficient, and is of itself altogether adequate.

High, Extr. Legal Rem. §§ 542-545; State v. Mineral Point Supra. 22 Wis. 396.

Cole, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator is the owner of a farm across which the defendant Company has constructed its railway track, dividing the farm into two separate parcels. The Company has been operating its road, running daily trains of cars over the same, for more than a year, but has neglected to construct suitable farm crossings for the convenience of the relator in passing with his teams and stock from one part of his premises to the other; and this application is for a mandamus to compel the Company to construct proper crossings. On motion, the alternative writ was quashed, and the appeal is from the order quashing the writ. In support of the decision of the circuit court, it is argued that the petition does not state facts showing that the relator is entitled to the relief demanded; in other words, that it fails to show that it is the duty of the Company to construct such farm crossings. This is a mistake as to the duty which the Statute imposes on the Company. Chapter 198, Laws 1881, which amends section 1810 of the Revised Statutes, provides, in effect, that every railroad corporation operating any railroad shall erect fences on both sides of its road of the height prescribed, with openings or gaps or bars therein, and suitable and convenient farm crossings of the road for the use of the occupant of the lands adjoining. Thus, it will be seen, the Statute imposes a distinct and absolute legal duty upon the Company to construct these farm crossings. The language of the Statute is clear and specific, and cannot be made plainer by illustration or argument. It is imperative or mandatory, requiring the corporation to perform its legal duty. It is said it appears from the petition that there is a public highway which runs along on the east side of the relator's farm, and connects the two portions thereof, and that where the railway crosses this highway a bridge has been built over a deep cut, which, it is claimed, answers every purpose of a farm crossing. We can make no such an inference from the matters stated in the petition, nor hold that the bridge meets the requirements of the Statute, and relieves the Company from the duty of constructing any other farm crossing. It is possible that the Company can show by evidence that this bridge on the highway fully answers the end and object of the Statute, but we cannot presume that it does. On the contrary, as the Statute, in absolute terms, makes it the duty of the Company to construct farm crossings for the use of the occupants of the adjoining lands, the Company is under obligation to show some valid excuse for neglecting to perform its duty. We therefore hold, as the duty of the Company was absolute and clear to make the proper farm crossings, unless there is some other objection to granting the writ, it was error to quash it on the facts stated. Again, it is said the court always refuses to grant a writ of mandamus where the party has another adequate legal remedy. But has the relator such a remedy? Section 1813 provides, where a railroad corporation neglects to construct farm crossings proper for the use of the lands over which its road is operated, the owner or occupant may give the corporation written notice to construct such necessary farm crossings, and if the company, after being so notified, neglects for three months to construct the crossings, it shall be liable to pay the owner or occupant $10 for each and every locomotive that may thereafter pass through the lands until the farm crossing is made. This provision enables the owner to sue the corporation and recover damages or penalties for its failure to perform its legal duty; but that will not secure the construction of the necessary farm crossing, nor will it afford an adequate remedy. The writ of mandamus would seem to be the most efficient, if not the only adequate, means for compelling the corporation to do its legal duty. It is true, in Jamestown v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co., 69 Wis. 648, and Oshkosh v. Milwaukee & L. W. R. Co., 74 Wis. 584, a bill in equity for a mandatory injunction was sustained to compel a corporation to restore a highway or street to its former condition of usefulness. Perhaps that remedy might have been resorted to in the present case, but, though a party may have redress in equity, that of itself is not a conclusive objection to granting the writ of mandamus. It may possibly, and would, influence the court in the exercise of the discretion which it possesses in granting the writ under the facts and circumstances of the particular case, but does not affect its right or jurisdiction. Nor does the fact that the party is liable to indictment and punishment for his omission to do the act to compel the performance of which the writ is sought constitute any objection to granting the writ. People v. New York, 10 Wend. 393; Short, Inform. Prohib. and Mand. 235. It seems to us clear that mandamus is the only legal remedy to which the relator can resort in this case to enforce his rights to compel the corporation to perform the duty which the law imposes. The fact that the Company is liable to pay $10 for each and every locomotive which passes over the land while it neglects, after notice for three months, to construct the proper farm crossing, constitutes no reason for denying the right. That does not take away the remedy, and does not profess to be exclusive of other means of redress. The learned counsel for the Company says, to entitle a person to the writ two things must concur: (1) a clear right to have the act done to compel the doing of which the writ is sought; and (2) that there is no other adequate legal remedy by which the performance of the specific duty can be enforced; and that the discharge of the duty is not discretionary. These conditions concur in the present case. The relator certainly has a clear legal right to have the farm crossings constructed for his use in cultivating the farm, and there is no other adequate legal remedy to compel the Company to do that act. If it shall appear on the hearing of the answer of the corporation that the making of the farm crossing is unnecessary because of the existence of a highway on the east side of the farm and the bridge over the cut furnishing all needful facilities for passing from one part of the premises to the other, or that the construction of a farm crossing would be impracticable on account of the situation of the land, these facts can be made to appear on the hearing. But, upon the matters set forth in the petition, nothing is shown which excuses the Company from performing its statutory duty.

The writ is directed to the corporation in its corporate name, and it is insisted that it is misdirected; but we are inclined to hold the direction good. Of course, the corporation must act through its officers and agents, but whose duty it is to see to the construction of farm crossings may not be known. We hold the direction is sufficient.

It follows from these views that the order of the Circuit Court quashing the writ must be reversed, and the cause be remanded for further proceedings according to law.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

W. L. PATTON, Admr. of John C. Tip-ton, Deceased, Appl.,

EAST TENNESSEE, VIRGINIA & GEORGIA R. CO.

(....Tenn....)

1. Negligence of a railroad company in failing to use proper appliances and employ competent servants, which results in the breaking in two of a moving train, will not warrant a recovery against it by one who, after waiting for the first section of the train to pass him, and without observing the approach of the other section, steps onto the track in front of it and is injured. Such negligence is not the proximate cause of the injury.

2. When a railroad train breaks in two leaving servants of the company on the rear section, which is permitted to continue on its way by force of gravitation, the company owes the duty, even to persons trespassing on its tracks, to station lookouts in such positions on the moving cars that they can watch the tracks ahead of them and warn persons thereon of their danger, a neglect of which may render the company liable for the injuries caused thereby.

3. The jury must determine whether or not a person was guilty of such contributory negligence as will prevent his recovering damages from a railroad company for injuries received while he was walking upon its tracks, where he had left the track to allow a train to overtake and pass him and then returned to it in front of a section of the train which had become detached and was following the first section by the force of gravitation, the approach of which he failed to discover because he was crossing a bridge over a waterfall the noise of which prevented his hearing the approaching cars.

4. Going upon a railroad track without looking and listening, even after a train has just passed, and continuing thereon unconscious of danger until overtaken and injured by a section of the train which had become detached and was being propelled by the force of gravitation, is negligence which must be allowed in mitigation of damages, even if the jury think it was not the proximate cause of the accident.

Larton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

John C. Tipton was killed by collision with a train operated by defendant in error while walking upon the track. His administrator brought this suit to recover damages for the negligent killing of his intestate. A demurrer was filed to the declaration, and upon argument was sustained, and the suit dismissed. The first count of the declaration in substance alleges that the intestate was walking upon the track, about one mile west of Telford Station. That he was overtaken by a train of freight cars going west, and stepped aside until the train passed, when he returned to the track, and resumed his journey in rear of the train just passed. While passing over a bridge and waterfall, and unconscious of the approach of another train, he was overtaken and killed by some detached freight cars which belonged to the train just passed. That the freight train, while going down grade, had broken in two, and that the rear portion was following the front section by force of gravity at a distance of about 200 yards. That, though there were upon this detached portion servants and employees of the Company, there was no one upon the lookout ahead, to give warning of the approach of these cars, or to make an effort to stop them by putting down the brakes. It charges that intestate was in a position where he could have been seen if there had been anyone upon the front end of the detached cars, and that it was negligence not to have someone in such position that a person on the track could have been seen and warned of his danger or the train stopped. A second count charges that the breaking of the train into two parts was the result of defective machinery and unskillful servants.

The demurrer to the second count was properly sustained. The connection between this accident and the negligence by which this train became broken into two parts is too remote. Such negligence, upon the facts stated, was not the proximate cause of this injury. As observed by counsel for the Railway Company, "a proximate cause is indicated by a probable result, and not a result extraordinary, or which could not have been expected or anticipated."

Does the first count state such a case as entitles plaintiff to go to a jury? We agree with the learned circuit judge in holding that the statutory precautions prescribed by section 1168, subsec. 5, of the Code, do not apply to the movement of detached cars, such as those causing this death. The case provided for by the Statute is that of a train pulled by a locomotive, and the precautions are those required to be observed by those servants upon the engine, and have regard to obstacles on the track in front of or ahead of the engine. The persons required by the Code to be on the lookout are "the engineer, fireman or some other person upon the locomotive." He is to be on the lookout "ahead;" that is, in the direction in which the engine is moving. The precautions to be observed when any person or obstruction appears on the track are chiefly such as can only be found upon the engine. It does not at all follow that, because the statutory precautions do not apply to the movement of cars detached as these, therefore the Railway Company was under no responsibility to take care that in the movement of such cars it did no injury to persons upon its track. The principles of the common law govern in cases not within the purview of the Statute.

The first question, then, to be considered is as to the duty of the Railway Company with reference to the movement of trains or cars having no locomotive in front to warn persons upon its track. Obviously, if a person is seen upon the track, and so near as to be apparently in danger, the duty of the company, irrespective of the Statute, would be to do all that was possible to prevent an accident, by giving an alarm, and stopping the train; and so this court has frequently said that the common law is only re-enacted by our Statute with reference to the duty of the company when a person or obstruction is seen on the track. Knowledge of the danger imposes the duty to do all that is possible to stop the train and prevent the accident. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Humphreys, 12 Lea, 200; Horne v. Memphis & O. R. Co. 1 Coldw. 76; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Pratt, 85 Tenn. 18.

This much is clear. But it is argued that the declaration does not allege that the intestate was seen on the track, and that at the common law the duty to do all that is possible to prevent an accident only arises with reference to a trespasser upon the track when such person is seen to be on the track and in danger. Upon this point the declaration charges "that while defendant's servants were upon said detached portion of said train, there was no one on the lookout ahead on the front portion thereof to give plaintiff's intestate warning of its approach, and defendant's employes on said train could have seen the plaintiff's intestate, and ought to have seen him, upon its track." While this is somewhat vague, yet we understand it in substance to charge that there were servants upon the cut-off cars, who could have seen plaintiff, if they had been on the lookout. When a train is thus broken in two by accident it ought to appear that after the breaking of the train there were servants upon the detached part, and that there was time sufficient for each servant before the happening of the accident to have taken such place and position on the front of the detached part so that the track could be watched ahead. The allegations of the declaration that there were servants upon the cars clearly meets the first requisition, and the further allegation that these servants "could have seen the plaintiff's intestate, and ought to have seen him," implies that they were at the time of the accident in such place as to have been able to keep watch over the track.

It is not charged that the deceased was upon the road at a public crossing, nor upon a part of the road commonly used by the public as a walkway, and, therefore, presumably by license. He must therefore be regarded as a trespasser. But it does not follow that this fact will preclude him from an action. "The mere fact that a party is a trespasser," says Judge Cooper in East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Fain, "will not prevent him from recovering for injuries negligently inflicted by another, which might have been averted by ordinary and proper prudence on the part of the latter. And, therefore, although a person be injured while unlawfully on the track of a railroad, or while contributing to the injury by his own carelessness or negligence, yet, if the injury might have been avoided by the use of ordinary care and caution by the railroad company, the company will be liable for damages." 13 Lea, 41.

A railway company in the operation of its trains owes a duty to trespassers without regard to our Statute. "The rule is," says Mr. Wood, after a consideration of this subject in the light of the decisions, "that a railway company is bound to keep a reasonable lookout for trespassers upon its track, and is bound to exercise such care as the circumstances require to prevent injury." 2 Wood, Railway Law, 1267.

Where cars are being moved by gravitation, and therefore with comparatively little noise, we think the duty quite clear that a railway company should have someone on the lookout for the purpose of warning persons on the track. A decent regard for the sanctity of human life would seem to require that a reasonable watch should be kept over a track upon which a train is moving, and that a person upon the track, and near enough to be apparently in danger, should be warned of the approach of a train. If the usual warning is ineffective to arouse to a consciousness of danger, then the failure to use every possible means to stop the train would be inexcusable 12 L. R. A.

negligence. The more populous the neighborhood in which a train is moving, the greater the necessity for vigilance in observing the track at crossings and points where, by license, express or implied, the track is used as a walkway, the more imperative the duty. But the duty is not altogether relaxed by the fact that this injury probably occurred at a point where the public had no right. We think, upon the facts stated in this case, that it was negligence when this train parted not to have had someone in position to observe the track and warn persons on it of its approach. The duty of keeping a lookout we do not understand to rest alone upon our Statute. This provision is, under our decisions, but a re-enactment of the rule at common law. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Fain, 13 Lea, 41; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Pratt, 85 Tenn. 13.

In the latter case Judge Snodgrass, in delivering the opinion of the court, said, in considering the requirement of the Code concerning the avoidance of accidents: "This section imposes no duty on the railroad companies that would not have existed at common law. The duty to keep someone on the lookout, sound the alarm whistle when any person, animal or other obstruction appears on this road, then put down brakes, and use every possible means employed for such purposes to stop the train and prevent an accident, is but, in other words, the duty to watch the road, warn anyone who appears on it to get off by such noise or alarm as will most effectually do this," etc.

We have next to consider whether the deceased was guilty of such contributory negligence as should bar a recovery. That it is negligence to go upon a railroad track without taking the precautions to look and listen is well established. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Houston, 95 U. S. 697, 24 L. ed. 542. He is as a prudent man bound to look and listen, and take such measures as common prudence, in view of the danger and consequences of a neglect to do so, suggest. "This is a rule of law," says Mr. Wood, "and it is only in exceptional cases that the question as to whether his neglect to take such precaution is excusable is for the jury." 2 Wood, Railway Law, 1304, 1305. The authorities to this effect are numerous, and are collected in the work cited. It is not charged in this declaration that the intestate did look or listen before going on the track and resuming his journey, and this is one ground of demurrer. Ordinarily this would be fatal in a case not coming within the letter of our Statute, which allows damages upon failure of the railway company to observe the precautions therein prescribed, regardless of the negligence of the party injured, such negligence going only in mitigation of damages. Railway Companies v. Foster, 88 Tenn. 672, where all our cases are reviewed.

The case stated in the declaration makes an exceptional case, and one which should go to a jury. The deceased stepped off to permit the approaching train to pass him. When it had passed it was not unreasonable to suppose it had all passed. The duty to look and listen when going upon a railway track is a continuing duty so long as one continues upon it, using it as a walkway. The duty of a person so situated to continue to look out for himself, in view of the consequence likely to result from inattention, cannot be less imperative than the duty of the employes operating a train to look out for him. The Statute not being applicable, the negligence of each may appear equal, and in that case there can be no recovery. The peculiar circumstances under which this intestate went upon the track, and the fact stated to account for his failure to observe this train, that he was crossing a bridge, under which was a waterfall, the noise of which probably prevented his hearing, alone prevent the negligence of the deceased from barring any recovery.

The fact that the deceased went on the track without looking or listening, and that he continued upon it unconscious of danger until overtaken and run down, is negligence which cannot be overlooked, and for this negligence he cannot be entirely exonerated, and this must be allowed in mitigation of damage, even if the jury shall think that it, under the peculiar facts of this case, was not the more immediate cause of the accident.

The demurrer must be sustained as to the second count, and overruled as to the first. The case will be remanded for further pleading.

This suit was commenced in the Circuit Court of Holt County. Plaintiff was a creditor of one B. W. Ross, deceased. The suit was for the purpose of recovering the amount of the debt from defendant on the ground that he had wrongfully appropriated and converted the assets belonging to Ross' estate to his own use. Plaintiff recovered judgment in the circuit court, and defendant appealed to the Kansas City Court of Appeals, where the judgment was reversed. The case was certified to this court by the court of appeals on the ground that the decision rendered therein was in conflict with the decision of this court in the cases of Foster v. Nowlin, 4 Mo. 18, and Magner v. Ryan, 19 Mo. 196. The question presented by the record in this case is sufficiently stated by Judge Phillips (29 Mo. App. 578) to be "whether there can be, under the probate system in this State, an executor de son tort, in so far as to authorize a single creditor of the intestate to maintain an action of trover against property of the intestate in discharge of his own debt, although it is a debt of a superior degree. Curtis v. Vernon, 3 T. R. 590; Padgett v. Priest, 2 T. R. 100, cited in 2 Bl. Com. 509, note.

Where, a short time after the death of a married woman, her executrix died, and no steps were taken for some time to have the will proved, the husband of the testatrix, having her estate in his hands and not causing the delay, cannot be treated as an executor de son tort. Blodgett v. Converse, 6 New Eng. Rep. 809, 60 Vt. 416.

One who intermeddles with the goods of deceased, or does any act characteristic of the office of executor, becomes an executor de son tort. Swift v. Martin, 2 West. Rep. 146, 19 Mo. App. 488.

The administrator of a deceased partner has no authority to meddle with the firm assets, or to introduce into the inventory the value of his intestate's share of them. Shipe's App. 5 Cent. Rep. 149, 114 Pa. 205.

If one who intermarries with the widow, who is administratrix, intermeddles with the assets by converting them into other property in his own name, he will be held as a trustee for the heirs, as to the property acquired by the conversion. Graves v. Pinchback, 47 Ark. 470.

him, as here sought, and thereby appropriate the whole assets to the payment of his debt."

The system provided by the laws of our State for the settlement of the estates of deceased persons was evidently intended to be exclusive of all others. The Constitution provides for the establishment of a probate court in each county, which shall have jurisdiction in all matters pertaining to probate business. The laws of the State governing the procedure in the management and settlement of estates are ample and sufficient to meet any emergency that may possibly arise during administration. They provide for the appointment of executors and administrators, for the preservation of the property, and the collection of the debts of the estate. They also provide summary and efficient proceedings for the discovery of assets, and for their recovery from the possession of one who intermeddles with them. Under them any creditor can have an administrator appointed. Each county is provided with a public administrator, already qualified, whose duty requires him summarily to take charge of all estates in which the property is left in a situation exposed to loss or damage; and the court is given power to require him to take charge of any other estates in case of necessity. Ample provision is made for the allowance and classification of debts, converting the assets into money, and paying the debts of all creditors pro rata according to classification. Executors and administrators alone, under these laws, can recover the assets or damages for its conversion. All these provisions of the law are wholly inconsistent with the idea of executors de son tort as at common law. The Administration Laws of the State do not recognize the right to wrongfully administer, nor the right of one creditor to secure payment of his debt to the exclusion of others. It is insisted by plaintiff that this State has adopted the common law, and that under the rules of the common law his action is authorized, and that the rules of the common law on this subject have not been abrogated by the statutes.

It is contended that under proper rules of construction a statute in derogation of the common law must be strictly construed, and that none of its rules can be changed, except by express terms of the statute, or by necessary implication therefrom. That rule of construction is not of universal application. It depends much upon the character of the law to be affected. In case of statutes penal in their character, or in derogation of common right, a strict construction is required; but in regard to statutes merely remedial in their character a fair, if not liberal, construction should be given. Oster v. Rabeneau, 46 Mo. 595; Putnam v. Ross, Id. 387; Chamberlain v. Western Transp. Co. 44 N. Y. 805; Buchanan v. Smith, 48 Miss. 90.

The Statute of this State, adopting the common law, itself limits or modifies the rule of construction insisted upon. Section 3117, Stat. 1879, provides that the common law, which is not repugnant to or inconsistent with the Constitution of this State or the statute laws in force for the time being, shall be the rule of action and decision in this State. The examination we have given shows conclusively that the statute laws of this State on the subject of administration, taken together as forming one entire system, are wholly repugnant to and inconsistent with the common law in respect to administrators de son tort. We must therefore conclude that the intention of the Legislature was to supersede the common law on that subject altogether. The early cases of this court referred to by the court of appeals do seem to have recognized and acted under the common-law doctrine invoked by plaintiff in this case, but since that early day the Administration Laws of the State have been greatly enlarged, the jurisdiction of the probate court extended, and the powers and duties of administrators and executors increased until there is no longer a place in the system for the inequitable, expensive and tedious proceedings required by the rules of the common law in bringing intermeddlers to settlement. The opinion of Phillips, P. J., in this case when

The next of kin of the decedent simply as such cannot maintain a suit against the executor de son tort, but in such a case the proper course is to procure the appointment of an administrator and have the suit instituted in his name. Ferguson v. Barnes, 58 Ind. 175; Muir v. Trustees of L. & W. Orphan House, 3 Barb. Ch. 477, 5 L. ed. 978.

Rights and liabilities.

An executor de son tort, who has paid a mortgage debt which is entitled to priority, with proper expenses of the sale, may be allowed credit therefor, when called to account for the proceeds of the mortgaged property. Davega v. Henry, 81 S. C. 413.

The estate of a widow who took possession of her husband's property without authority, and carried on the business left by him, should be credited for no more than the amount of debts of her husband which she paid. Jenks v. Breen, 4 Cent. Rep. 92, 42 N. J. Eq. 825.

A bill praying that a decree be rendered against the son of a person against whom a former decree was taken, and who was acting as executor de son tort for his father's estate, for the amount of the prior decree or for the value of the property converted by the son, on demurrer, shows equity. Ellis v. McGee, 63 Miss. 168.

An executor de son tort is liable for the amount wrongfully collected by him, to the rightful representative of deceased; and after his death his estate is liable. A cause of action against him does not depend upon the debts, but upon their collection, and the Statute of Limitations has no bearing. Swift v. Martin, 2 West. Rep. 146, 19 Mo. App. 488.

He is liable only for what comes into his hands. Blake v. Hawkins, 98 W. S. 315, 25 L. ed. 139.

He is liable in an action, not only by the rightful executor, but also by a creditor of deceased. Ibid.

The effect of the Oregon Code of Civil Procedure is to abolish the common-law rule making one who wrongfully interferes with the estate of a deceased person an executor de son tort, and takes away the remedy which a creditor formerly had to charge the intermeddler as such. Rutherford v. Thompson, 14 Or. 236.

His remedy now is to procure the appointment of an administrator, and have a proceeding instituted in the name of the latter to recover the property misappropriated. Ibid.

In California there is no such officer recognized as an executor de son tort. Bowden v. Pierce, 73 Cal. 459.

before the court of appeals, and which is reported in 29 Mo. App. 570, with the authorities cited by him, is convincing and conclusive, and is adopted as the opinion of this court.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed, and that of the Circuit Court of Holt County reversed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ST. LOUIS, IRON MOUNTAIN & SOUTHERN R. CO., Appt.,

John T. HOPKINS.

(....Ark....)

1. The fall of a large wooden sign of its own weight from its position over a public sidewalk raises the presumption of negligence in respect to its fastenings.
2. It is the duty of one who knows that his office sign fastened over a sidewalk has been removed from its fastenings by workmen of an electric-light company, and replaced by them, to see that the fastenings are safely restored, and he is liable for failure to do so if anyone is injured by its fall.
3. An injury is not attributable to an act of God, but to neglect, where it is caused by the fall of a sign in a wind such as might be expected in the regular course of the seasons.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pulaski County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dodge & Johnson, for appellant:

The placing of the sign before the defendant's ticket office was the work of an independent contractor, for whose negligent acts the defendant cannot be held liable.

St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Yonley, 9 L. R. A. 604, 58 Ark. 503.

This action cannot be maintained on the ground of a nuisance, created, maintained or authorized by the defendant.

NOTE.—Liability of abutting property owner for injuries caused by materials falling into street.

The general rule is that the owner of a building or structure abutting on a highway is liable for injuries caused by the fall therefrom into the street of materials composing part of the structure, or which the owner has attached thereto for his own convenience, as well as of those which have accumulated on or around the building from natural causes, which the owner ought to have foreseen and provided against. The only uncertainty appears to be as to how far the owner is relieved from liability by the acts of third persons, and as to how far negligence must be shown on the part of the landowner in order to fix his liability. Since the duty to keep the building in repair rests primarily on the landowner, it seems that if the building is actually in his possession, and is permitted to remain in a defective and dangerous condition, he is liable for injuries resulting therefrom, whether the defect is caused by the act of a third person or by that of an independent contractor, who has been at work on the building. Thus, in Khron v. Brock, 4 New Eng. Rep. 424, 144 Mass. 519, the court said it cannot be contended that if the work was completed, the owner would not be responsible for injuries resulting from the imperfect construction or dangerous condition in which it was permitted by him to remain, and ruled that an instruction that the defendant was not liable unless the zinc (by the falling of which the injury occurred) was unfastened by him and was negligently and carelessly left so unfastened, was properly refused.

So, where a stranger without the owner's consent attaches a wire to a chimney, by which the chimney is rendered unsafe and liable to fall, and it so remains for some time, when it falls and inflicts injury, the owner is liable. Gray v. Boston Gas Light Co. 114 Mass. 153.

So where a former tenant attached an unsafe hoisting apparatus to the building and the landlord subsequently leased the building with such apparatus attached, he is liable for injuries caused by its fall. Hungerford v. Bent, 55 Hun, 4.

So where defendant had by a lease acquired practical ownership of premises for a term of years and erected a building thereon, which was subsequently burned, leaving a wall standing next to the street, and he sold the machinery, etc., in the ruins to a third person, who took possession of the premises for the purpose of removing it, and during such possession the building fell causing injury, both defendant and the third person were held liable therefor. Grogan v. Pope I. & M. Co. 8 West. Rep. 238, 87 Mo. 321. See also Tarry v. Ashton, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 320.

Upon the question whether or not proof of negligence is necessary, it has been held that if a landowner constructs his building so near the street with a roof of such a shape that at certain seasons of the year snow and ice will inevitably be precipitated upon the sidewalk below, he must at his peril keep the ice and snow from doing injury, and the question of whether or not he was negligent in not caring for it under the circumstances and with the roof in that condition is immaterial. Shipley v. Fifty Associates, 101 Mass. 252, 106 Mass. 199; Hannem v. Pence, 40 Minn. 127.

In a case where a brick fell from a dilapidated wall, causing injury, the court ruled that the duty is imposed upon abutting property owners of keeping their premises in such repair that persons lawfully using the streets shall do so without injury,

Where one contracts to do a thing not necessarily a nuisance or dangerous, and he can do that thing without wrong or injury to anybody, yet, in so doing, by his negligent acts, he injures another or creates a nuisance, the principal is not liable, but the contractor is.

So one who maintains a lamp over the highway has the duty to keep it in such state of repair as not to prejudice the public (Tarry v. Ashton, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 320); although one of the judges seems to limit the owner's responsibility to investigating from time to time and repairing defects when he became or ought to have become aware of their existence.

The New Hampshire court holds that a complaint in an action to recover damages for injuries caused by snow sliding from a roof into the street is not good if it fails to charge negligence on the part of the owner, stating that the case is within that class where a man will not be answerable for the consequences of enjoying his own property in the way such property is usually enjoyed, unless an injury has resulted to another from the want of proper care or skill on his part. Garland v. Towne, 55 N. H. 56.

There is a distinction made in that case, however, in case the building is a nuisance, the court stating that it, under the law of the State, the erection or continuance of a building or any portion thereof over a highway is a nuisance, and the caves project, so that snow and ice are precipitated therefrom into the street, liability exists without proof of negligence.

It has been held that any building which is allowed to become out of repair so as to endanger the safety of persons passing on the street is a nuisance. Reg. v. Watts, 1 Salik. 357.

And where a sign is hung over the street in violation of a city ordinance the fact that the owner used due care is immaterial. Salisbury v. Herchenroder, 106 Mass. 458.

Even though negligence is regarded as necessary to a recovery, the tendency of the courts is to apply the maxim res ipsa loquitur and hold that proof of the happening of the accident is sufficient proof of negligence in the absence of explanatory circumstances.

So held where the wall of a building fell into the street (Mullen v. St. John, 57 N. Y. 571); where a barrel fell from a window (Byrnes v. Boadle, 2 Hurlst. & C. 722); where bags of sugar fell (Scott v. London Dock Co. 3 Hurlst. & C. 596); where snow fell from a roof into the street. Smethurst v. Independent Cong. Church, 2 L. R. A. 685, 148 Mass. 261.

Where a railroad company carried its tracks over a highway by means of a bridge, which rested in part on a brick pier, the court held that the company was under the common-law liability to keep the bridge in safe condition for the public using the highway to pass under it, and the fact that the slight vibration caused by a passing train resulted in the fall of a brick, which injured plaintiff, showed negligence. Kearney v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. 760. See also Garland v. Towne, 55 N. H. 56.

Co. L. R. 8 Q. B. 161, 5 Moak, Eng. Rep. 169; Edgerton v. New York & H. R. Co. 39 N. Y. 227; Curtis v. Rochester & S. R. Co. 18 N. Y. 534; George v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 34 Ark. 613.

The sign was a nuisance.

Cockrill, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant maintained a ticket-office in City of Little Rock, and advertised the fact by means of a large wooden sign fastened to the wall over the entrance from the street, fifteen feet above the sidewalk. The sign fell upon the appellee, and injured him, without fault of his, while he was upon the sidewalk. This appeal is prosecuted to reverse a judgment for damages in the sum of $750, recovered by the appellee for the injury. When the sign-board was first put up it was securely fastened. Its weight was supported by brick projections from the wall. Subsequently the servants of an electric-light company removed it from its fastenings in order to run electric wires into the railway office. That fact was known to the railway agent in charge of the office. He had been warned at the outset by the contractor who put the sign in position that the electric-light workmen would be compelled to loosen the fastenings if they were permitted to follow instead of preceding him. The sign was replaced in position by the electric-light workmen, and two months thereafter fell and injured the plaintiff. An inspection of it after the accident showed that the wires which were used to hold it on two of the three hooks had been cut with scissors close to the sign. The supposition of all the witnesses was that the cutting was done by the electric-light workmen. There was no positive proof of that fact. The sign fell in the month of March. There was testimony tending to show that the usual March winds of this latitude prevailed at the time, while other witnesses thought there was no disturbance of any object on the street from wind.

The Railway complains of the following part of the charge to the jury: "If you find from the evidence that the defendant caused the sign mentioned in this action to be placed on the side of and in front of its ticket-office, in the City of Little Rock, and over and above the sidewalk, which is a public highway, and that while the plaintiff was on said sidewalk, and under said sign, the same fell of its own weight from its place, and upon the plaintiff, and injured him, you are instructed that the fact of said falling of said sign in the manner aforesaid raises a presumption of negligence in maintaining said sign, and you would find for the plaintiff, unless you should find that said presumption is overcome by a fair preponderance of evidence going to show that a proper degree of diligence had been exercised by defendant." It is argued that the charge directs the jury to presume negligence without finding proof of it. If it had left the jury to find 12 L. R. A.

against the Railway merely upon proof that the plaintiff had been injured by the falling of a sign from a building in which the Railway was an occupant, it would be subject to the objection urged, and therefore erroneous. But the charge must be read in the light of the admitted facts and of the hypothesis upon which it is based. They are as follows: The sign was placed in a position where it was sure to fall upon the sidewalk, if it should fall at all, in a much frequented part of the city. It was maintained there by the defendant solely for its convenience. It was heavy, and required precaution in fastening it in position to prevent it from falling. It fell "of its own weight,"—that is, because of insufficient fastenings to hold it under ordinary circumstances,—and thereby an injury was inflicted upon one who was rightfully in the public street. Upon such a case found, negligence is an inference of law. The reason is as follows: The defendant was under a duty to the public to exercise common prudence to place and keep its sign in such position as not to endanger the safety of pedestrians in the street. As long as it performed that duty no injury would be inflicted, in the ordinary course of things. The happening of the accident is evidence, therefore, of the neglect of the duty, in the absence of proof that it happened out of the ordinary course. Mullen v. St. John, 57 N. Y. 567; Kearney v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. 759, 10 Cent. L. J. 261, and numerous cases cited.

It is argued that the defendant is not liable, because the evidence shows that the sign fell, not from insecurity of the original fastening, but because the sustaining wires had been cut by a third person. We must take it as settled by the verdict that the wires were cut by the electric-light company's workmen. The testimony furnished no reasonable probability that it was done by another. The managing agent of the defendant's office knew that it was necessary for these workmen to cut or loosen the fastenings in order to complete the work the Railway Company desired to be done in its office, and knew that the sign had been removed for that purpose. It was the Company's duty, therefore, to see that the fastenings were safely restored. In no other manner could it guard against the danger to which the public would otherwise be exposed, and it is liable for the consequences of having neglected to do so. Gray v. Boston Gas-Light Co. 114 Mass. 149-153. The fact that the electric-light company was an independent contractor, and not the servant of the railway, in performing the work in the prosecution of which the wires were cut, did not relieve the Railway of its duty to the public to see that the sign was secure after the contractor had completed his work. Khron v. Brock, 144 Mass. 516, 4 New Eng. Rep. 424.

If the injury had been inflicted through the negligence of the contractor's servants while in the execution of the contract, no liability would have attached to the Railway. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Yonley, 53 Ark. 503, 9 L. R. A. 604. But no such case was made by the proof. The court did not err, therefore, in rejecting the Railway's prayer to charge upon the subject of its non liability for work done by an independent contractor. The court refused to instruct the jury that the defendant was not liable for the injury if the sign fell from the act of God. There was no testimony to base the charge upon. The strongest testimony for the defendant was that the accident happened on a windy day in March. But it was the defendant's duty to take such precaution in fastening its sign as to make it secure against the ravages of such winds as might be expected in the regular course of the seasons.

Southern Exp. Co. v. Texarkana Water Co. (Ark.) Jan. 17, 1891. An injury resulting from a failure to take such precaution is attributable to its neglect, and not the act of God.

Other requests to charge the jury preferred by the defendant were rejected, but all they contained that could legally be demanded to go to the jury was submitted in the court's charge.

As there is no error, the judgment is affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

George W. RYMER, Appt.,
v.
LUZERNE COUNTY.

(....Pa.....)

A statute which applies only to a limited number of counties, although not local or special for the reason that it applies to all of a certain class created by the Constitution itself, is not impliedly repealed by a general statute without negative words.

(April 27, 1891.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Luzerne County in favor of defendant upon a case stated for the opinion of the court, the object of which was to determine plaintiff's right to compensation for services performed as county auditor, the agreement being that if the court was of opinion that the Act of May 12, 1887, was in force in the County and repealed prior Acts, judgment was to be entered for plaintiff, if not, judgment was to be entered for defendant. Affirmed.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. John McGahren for appellant.

Mr. Joseph Moore for appellee.

Per Curiam:

Luzerne County has a population exceeding 150,000. Section 5, art 14, of the Constitution L. R. A.

tion provides that "in all counties containing over 150,000 inhabitants, all county officers shall be paid by salary, and the salary of any such officer and his clerks, heretofore paid by fees, shall not exceed the aggregate amount of fees earned during his term and collected by or for him." The 14th section of the Act of March 31, 1876 (Pub. Laws, 18), was intended to give effect to this provision of the Constitution, and provides that the salaries of county auditors in counties containing over 150,000 inhabitants shall be $500 each. This fixes the salary of the county auditors of Luzerne at that sum. It was contended that the Act of 1876 was repealed by the Act of May 12, 1887 (Pub. Laws, 95), which fixes the compensation of county auditors at $8 per day and mileage. It is not to be presumed, however, that the Legislature intended the Act of 1887 to operate in counties when a salary had been fixed by the Act of 1876 in obedience to the constitutional requirement. The Act of 1887 contains no repealing clause, and while the Act of 1876 is neither a local nor a special law for the reason that it applies to all counties of a certain class,—and that class created by the Constitution itself,—yet its operation is confined to a limited number of counties, and we think comes within the reason of the rule laid down in numerous cases, that a general statute without negative words does not repeal a previous statute which is particular, even though the provisions of one be different from the other.

CASEY

CINCINNATI TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION, NO. 3, et al.

(45 Fed. Rep. 135.)

1. A boycott is an illegal conspiracy in restraint of trade.
2. An injunction may be issued to restrain the publication and circulation of posters, circulars, etc., for carrying out a conspiracy to boycott the complainant.
3. Statements of advertisers in a newspaper at the time of withdrawing their patronage that it was because they had been visited by a committee of a typographical union and were threatened with loss of business, are admissible as part of the res gestæ in an action to enjoin a boycott.
4. Upon the hearing of a motion for a preliminary injunction, the rules of evidence are applied less strictly than upon the final hearing of the cause, and consequently evidence that would not be competent in support of an application for a perpetual injunction may be admitted.

(January 31, 1891.)

SUIT to enjoin defendants from boycotting plaintiff's newspaper. On motion for temporary injunction. Granted.

Note.—Conspiracy defined.

A conspiracy is a combination of two or more persons, by some concerted action, to accomplish some criminal or unlawful purpose, or to accomplish a purpose not unlawful by unlawful means. Owens v. State, 15 Lea, 1; Spies v. People, 10 West. Rep. 701, 122 Ill. 1; United States v. Wooten, 20 Fed. Rep. 705; United States v. Lancaster (Ga.) 10 L. R. A. 333.

It is a joint willful and malicious common purpose. People v. Petherane, 7 West. Rep. 522, 64 Mich. 232.

To constitute a conspiracy the combination must be corrupt. Wood v. State, 1 Cent. Rep. 441, 47 N. J. L. 461.

Concurrence of sentiment and co-operative conduct in a criminal enterprise are the essential ingredients of a criminal conspiracy. McKee v. State, 9 West. Rep. 840, 111 Ind. 373, citing Archer v. State, 4 West. Rep. 723, 106 Ind. 423; 2 Wharton, Crim. Law, 1363.

As soon as the union of wills for the unlawful purpose is perfected, the offense of conspiracy is complete. Spies v. People, supra.

The offense is complete when the unlawful conspiracy, combination or agreement is made; and a criminal act done in pursuance of the conspiracy is not necessary to justify a conviction for the crime of conspiracy itself. United States v. Lancaster, supra.

Statement by Sage, J.:

The complainant, proprietor and publisher of The Commonwealth, a daily and weekly newspaper published at Covington, Ky., sues to restrain the defendant, the Cincinnati Typographical Union, No. 3, which, the bill avers, is a corporation organized under the laws of Ohio as a trades union or labor organization, composed of type-setters and printers, and the individual defendants, who, it is averred, are its officers and managing agents, from "boycotting" the complainant and his newspaper.

A restraining order to remain in force until the hearing and disposition of complainant's motion for a temporary injunction having been granted when the bill was filed, the cause is now before the court upon that motion.

It appears from the bill that in September, 1890, and at various other times, the defendant, the Typographical Union, demanded that the complainant should unionize his office, that is to say, publish and conduct his paper according to the customs, rules and regulations laid down and prescribed by said Typographical Union, and that he should pay his employees wages at such rates as should be fixed from time to time by said Union, and discharge from his employment all persons not members thereof.

The bill further avers that upon complainant's refusal to comply with said demands, defendants illegally and unlawfully and with intent to injure complainant, and to destroy the circulation of his newspaper, and its value as an advertising medium, conspired and combined to boycott him and his newspaper, and to that end caused to be printed and posted, in conspicuous places, large hand-bills, calling upon all persons to withdraw their patronage from complainant's newspaper, and issued circulars, signed by said Typographical Union and addressed to advertising patrons of the complainant, requesting them to withdraw their advertisements from the said newspaper, threatening that upon failure to do so they would be visited with the ill will and incur the enmity of all organized labor, and that they would induce all members of labor associations to withdraw all patronage from them. It is also averred that said Typographical Union sent circulars to the news agents handling and selling complainant's newspaper, threatening that unless they ceased selling said paper they would in like manner lose the patronage of and be antagonized by the members of all labor organizations.

The bill further sets forth that said Typographical Union, through its agents and employes, visited persons regularly advertising in complainant's newspaper, and threatened them that unless they withdrew their advertisements they would incur the enmity, ill will and antagonism of all organized labor and of the friends of such labor, who would withdraw from them their entire business patronage.

The answers of the defendants have not yet been filed. The hearing of the motion was upon the bill, and upon affidavits filed on behalf of the complainant, and on behalf of the defendants. There is not much dispute as to the facts. Excepting the averment that the Typographical Union, through its agents, visited the advertising patrons of The Commonwealth, or any other patrons of the complainant, and threatened to boycott them unless they withdrew their patronage, the averments of the bill are substantially admitted.

The complainant, in his affidavit, states that compliance with the demand made upon him in September by the individual defendants who acted in that behalf as a committee from the Typographical Union, that he should unionize his office, would have necessitated the discharge of all the printers employed by him and the substitution and the exclusive employment of what are known as "union printers," that is, members of some typographical union, and that there was not then, nor is there now, any complaint upon the part of his employes. He says that he refused to comply with the demands so made, and continued to run his office as before, paying his printers the price agreed upon, which was satisfactory to them.

The complainant further sets forth in his affidavit particulars of the boycott thereupon inaugurated against him, and his paper and job office, as set forth in the bill. Copies of the hand-bills and circulars referred to are filed with the affidavits, and the names of customers to whom they were sent are given.

Boycotting.

The term "boycotting" was derived from the name of Captain Boycott, an agent of Lord Erne, and a farmer of Lough Mask, in the District of Connemara, Ireland. The people of his neighborhood took offense at him, and resolved not to have or allow others to have any communication with him England under Gladstone, by Justin H. McCarthy. See State v. Glidden, 3 New Eng. Rep. 849, 55 Conn. 48.

The boycott is not the remedy to adjust differences between capital and labor. State v. Stewart, 4 New Eng. Rep. 373, 59 Vt. 273.

An unlawful combination to prevent, by violence and intimidation, a certain company from retaining and taking into its employ certain workmen is an indictable conspiracy. Ibid.

Persons styling themselves the "Executive Board of the Ocean Association of the Longshoremen's Union," not in plaintiff's employ, who procured its workmen to quit in a body and declare a boycott on its business, to compel it to pay the wages demanded by them, were guilty of illegal and actionable acts, and were liable to arrest. Old Dominion S. S. Co. v. McKenna, 34 Blatchf. 244, 30 Fed. Rep. 48.

All associations designed to interfere with the perfect freedom of employers in the proper management and control of their lawful business, or to dictate in any particular terms upon which their business shall be conducted, by means of threats, or by interference with their property or traffic, or with their lawful employment of other persons, are pro tanto illegal combinations or associations. Ibid., citing *Johnston Harvester Co. v. #### Combination of persons, when a conspiracy.

A combination is a conspiracy in law whenever the act to be done has a necessary tendency to prejudice the public or oppress individuals, by unjustly subjecting them to the power of the confederates and giving effect to the purposes of the latter, whether of extortion or mischief. 1 Hawk, P. C. chap. 27, § 2; 2 Russ. Cr. 674; 2 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 282; 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 173; Desty, Crim. Law, § 11; 3 Chitty, Crim. Law, 1138; Archb. Crim. Pr. and Pl. 1880.

The offense has been held to consist in the conspiracy, and not in the acts committed in carrying it into effect, and the charge is sufficient if made in general terms describing an unlawful conspiracy to effect a bad purpose. State v. Stewart, 4 New Eng. Rep. 373, 59 Vt. 273, citing People v. Fisher, 14 Wend. 9; State v. Donaldson, 22 N. J. L. 151; Snow v. Wheeler, 113 Mass. 186; State v. Noyes, 25 Vt. 415; State v. Burnham, 15 N. H. 396; Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co. 68 Pa. 173; Mogul S. S. Co. v. McGregor, L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 476.

Printers' unions.

A combination of persons constituting a printers' union conspiring to use means of intimidation to compel a publishing company to abstain from keeping in its employ workmen of its own choice is clearly prohibited by statute. State v. Glidden, 3 New Eng. Rep. 849, 55 Vt. 44.

Where the purpose was to prevent the publishing company from carrying on its business in its own way, the motive being to gain an unjust advantage to themselves, the act was legally corrupt; and as the means adopted to carry out the purpose were

Commonwealth, after two years' promising repeatedly to unionize their office, stated to a committee from the Typographical Union that they would not employ union printers on their paper. Therefore the Typographical Union asks all workmen and women who sympathize with laborers to let The Commonwealth severely alone, and patronize those who employ union men, and who believe 'the laborer is worthy of his hire.'

The following is a copy of a circular:

"To Workingmen: The proprietor of The Covington Commonwealth (daily and weekly), after two years of opposition to organized labor, he having repeatedly promised to unionize his office, now refuses to keep his word, and says that he will not employ union printers. All working men and women who believe that the laborer is worthy of his hire will confer a favor on Typographical Union by withdrawing their patronage from The Covington Commonwealth."

In the Union Bulletin of October 1, 1890, issued under the auspices of Cincinnati Typographical Union, No. 3, and published at Cincinnati, is to be found the following:

"TAKE NOTICE.

"It is requested of all who are friendly to organized labor that they buy nothing from the following firms: . . . The Commonwealth (newspaper and job office), Covington, Kentucky."

A like notice is published in the Union Bulletin of October 29, 1890.

intended to harm the company, it was therefore malicious, and constituted an offense within the statute. Ibid.

An information charging the object of a conspiracy to have been to compel a newspaper company, against its will, by means of the boycott, to discharge workmen of its own choice and employ defendants and such persons as they should name, charges acts prohibited by statute. Ibid.

If defendants in their circular reading: "A word to the wise is sufficient. Boycott the company,"—used the word in its original sense, in its application to the company, there can be no doubt of their criminal intent. Ibid.

Dictation to, and coercion of, employers and employees.

A combination of employees whose aim is to dictate to an employer whom he should discharge from his employ is unlawful, as an unwarrantable interference with the conduct of his business. State v. Donaldson, 32 N. J. L. 186; Rex v. Ferruson, 2 Stark. 493; Rex v. Ryckerdike, 1 Mood. & R. 179.

A letter written by a "chairman" of an organized body to an employee in a shop that he might remain in it to do a particular kind of work, but to confine himself to work designated by the writer, is an unwarrantable interference with the business. Re Wabash R. Co. 24 Fed. Rep. 230.

It is an indictable conspiracy for several employees to combine and notify their employer that, unless he discharges certain enumerated persons, they will in a body quit his employment. *State v. Mr. Casey afterwards promised to employ union men, and the Union, relying on the promise, looked for the fulfillment of the same.

"On Monday, September 23, 1890, a committee from Typographical Union, No. 3, waited upon Mr. Casey, and asked him to keep the promise he had so often made. Col. Casey informed the committee that he would not employ union printers.

"The committee then reported his answer to the Union. The Union now appeals to all in sympathy with labor to use their influence with Mr. Casey, try to show him the error of his way, and, failing in that, to withdraw their patronage from the 'rat' or 'scab' Commonwealth until it is unionized.

Complainant also attaches a copy of the Union Bulletin of December 1, 1890, which contains the following article:

"BOYCOTT THE COMMONWEALTH.

"We understand that Mr. Casey is going around and telling his advertisers and subscribers that his office is now a union office; that the difficulty with the Typographical Union, No. 8, has been adjusted.

"Such is not the case, however. The boycott is still on, and will be until the proprietor of that 'rat' sheet employs union men.

"We request all K. of L. assemblies, unions and working men to bear in mind that Mr. Casey refuses to employ, or in any way recognize, organized labor. We ask your aid in compelling Mr. Casey to recognize the rights of labor. Withdraw your patronage from the 'scab' Commonwealth, and, if possible, let Mr. Casey know why you stop his 'rat' paper.

"Do not patronize a merchant who advertises in the 'rat' Commonwealth.

"Did Mr. Casey think of discrimination when he shut out his union printers (three of them residents of Covington), in 1888, and compelled them to seek employment elsewhere?"

The complainant filed the affidavit of J. Plant, a member of a firm of jewelers at Cincinnati, Ohio. He states that the firm received by mail on or about December 1, 1890, the following circular:

"Dear Sir: We beg leave to call your attention to the trouble between The Covington Daily Commonwealth and Typographical Union, No. 8. In the spring of 1888 the proprietor of The Commonwealth refused to pay the scale of wages agreed upon, and the union men quit working. Mr. Casey afterwards promised to pay the scale, but kept putting it off, and now refuses to keep his promise.

"The Typographical Union, No. 8, has lived up to its part of the contract, but Mr. Casey refuses to recognize labor in any way. Therefore we request your aid in unionizing The Commonwealth.

"You are a business man, and no doubt rely upon the workmen for some trade. If you wish to retain the good-will of labor, withdraw your advertising from The Commonwealth, refuse to subscribe for the sheet, and your aid in our behalf will be highly appreciated.

S. Rev. Stat., § 3608. United States v. Lancaster (Ga.) 10 L. R. A. 323.

The complainant also presents to the court the affidavits of sundry of his advertising patrons, prominent business men of the City of Cincinnati, and of the Cities of Covington and Newport, Ky., showing the receipt by them of the circulars above. These affidavits make it clear that by concerted action complainant's advertising patrons, who furnished him the bulk of his business in that line, were pried, through the mails, up to the issuance of the restraining order herein, with circulars calling upon them to withdraw their advertisements under penalty of the loss of the trade and the good-will of members of labor unions, and of all in sympathy with them.

There is also an affidavit of Henry M. Davis, advertising solicitor in Cincinnati for complainant. He states that Mabley & Carew and Fechheimer Bros. & Co., business firms in Cincinnati, were up to the 1st of October, 1890, regular advertisers in The Commonwealth, and that their advertisements were of the value of about $150 per month to complainant. Early in October, 1890, he visited said firms, and, as usual, solicited their advertisements, which were refused, for the reason, as stated by their advertising managers, that they had been visited by a committee of said Typographical Union, and threatened that unless they withdrew their advertisements no member of any trades union or labor association would purchase from them; and that he had since then repeatedly visited and solicited them, and in each case met with the same refusal, stated to be for the same reason, and that the advertising patronage of said firms had been wholly withdrawn from said paper because of said threats.

The affiant mentions several other firms of Cincinnati, advertising in The Commonwealth, who reported to him that they were in like manner threatened.

On behalf of the defendants there was presented the joint affidavit of the defendants J. B. Sloop, Oscar Bailey and Frank L. Rist, who say that they are members of said Typographical Union, and connected with its management, and well acquainted with all the facts and acts of said Union, so far as they relate to matters alleged by the complainant.

They further say that in the fall of 1888, and at divers times between that date and September 29, 1890, committees of the Union, whereof one or more of the affiants in each instance were members, called upon complainant and urged and requested him to employ members of the Union in the publication of his newspaper and the carrying on of his business of job printing, and to pay the prices, which were fair and reasonable, fixed by the scale adopted by said Union, and that the complainant from time to time promised said committees, and in divers ways induced them to believe, that he would comply with their request.

They admit that they visited the complainant in September, 1890, as he alleges in his affidavit, and they say that they then reminded him of his promises as above stated, and requested him to comply with them, which he refused to do, and informed them that he would not employ union printers, that is to say, members of said Typographical Union, in his office at all.

They further deny that any of the circulars or other publications mentioned by complainant in his affidavit misrepresent the facts as they existed.

They further say that none of the firms mentioned in complainant's affidavit were at any time visited by a committee from said Typographical Union; that no such committee was ever appointed by said Union; and that the members of said Union individually, so far as is known to affiants, and known to the defendants named in the bill of complaint, have not

Everyone who enters into a common purpose or design is generally, in law, a party to every act which had before been done by the others, and a party to every act which may afterwards be done by any of the others, in furtherance of such common design. Card v. State, 7 West. Rep. 83, 109 Ind. 415; McKee v. State, 9 West. Rep. 383, 111 Ind. 378. See Williams v. State, 47 Ind. 508; Jones v. State, 64 Ind. 478; Walton v. State, 83 Ind. 9; Archer v. State, 4 West. Rep. 739, 106 Ind. 428; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 111.

All persons engaged therein will be guilty of conspiracy, whether actually present at the commission of any act of violence or not. Newman v. Com. (Pa.) 5 Cent. Rep. 497.

Evidence, acts and declarations.

When evidence has been adduced prima facie establishing a conspiracy among the several defendants, the acts and declarations of each in furtherance of the common design are the acts and declarations of all. Spies v. People, 10 West. Rep. 701, 122 Ill. 1; Williams v. State, 51 Ala. 1; Brown v. Herr, 21 Neb. 113; Card v. State, 7 West. Rep. 81, 109 Ind. 415; State v. Glidden, 3 New Eng. Rep. 242, 55 Conn. 42; Tucker v. Finch, 66 Wis. 17; Owens v. State, 16 Lea, 1.

The same rule as to the admission of acts or declarations of one conspirator applies in criminal as in civil cases. Card v. State, supra, citing Smith v. Freeman, 71 Ind. 85; Hogue v. McClintock, 76 Ind. 205; Wolfe v. Fugh, 101 Ind. 238; Daniels v. McGinnis, 97 Ind. 542.

Only those declarations are admissible which were made during the progress of the conspiracy and in furtherance of its objects. United States v. Gunnell, 8 Cent. Rep. 764, 5 Mackey, 198; Card v. State, supra.

When the common design has been consummated, nothing said or done by one can affect the others. Owens v. State, supra, citing 1 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 732; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 111.

It is discretionary to admit proof of declarations before proof of conspiracy. Spies v. People, 10 West. Rep. 701, 122 Ill. 1, citing State v. Winner, 17 Kan. 298; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 111; Rosecoe, Cr. Ev. 7th ed. p. 415.

Evidence is admissible of a conversation between five or six members of the union, which inaugurated and prosecuted the boycott, that they were to pay fifty cents a week for the expense of the boycott, and that it would be paid for by the company. State v. Glidden, supra.

One conspirator cannot testify for another. A continuance will not be given to allow one conspirator who is evading arrest to testify for another. Lisle v. Com. 22 Ky. 250.

Joint assent of minds may be established by circumstantial evidence. Spies v. People, supra, citing 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 190, and note 7.

at any time visited said firms or any other persons in regard to the differences between the complainant and the said Union, or its members. Nor has said Union, or its members, in any manner, through its committees or agents, threatened said firms or any other persons as complainant has alleged in his affidavit; nor has said Union, or any committee therefrom, or any of its members, so far as is known to affiants, in any wise interfered with the printers employed by the complainant, or with any of his employes.

They deny that any committee, officer or agent of the Union has at any time visited the firm of Mabley & Carew, or the firm of Fechheimer Bros. & Co., in respect to said differences, or threatened said firms, or either of them, in any manner, through committees or agents, as is charged upon hearsay in the affidavit of Henry M. Davis.

They further deny that the posters, circulars and other publications mentioned in complainant's affidavit contained or were intended to express any threats or to seek by intimidation to interfere with the business of the complainant. They affirm that said posters and circulars and other publications were intended to present, and did in fact present, reasons why they should give their patronage to and employ the members of said Typographical Union; and to those employers who were friendly to and willing to employ members of said Union and like unions of organized labor.

Defendants also file the affidavit of Henry Curtin, the advertising manager of Mabley & Carew, and of Ed. Renau, advertising manager of Fechheimer Bros., who say that they have read the affidavit of Henry M. Davis, and that it is not true that they or their firm were threatened by said Union, or any committee thereof, with the loss of patronage if they continued to advertise in The Covington Commonwealth, and they deny that they so stated to Davis.

Appended to the affidavit of Renau is the affidavit of Jacob S. Fechheimer, of the firm of Fechheimer Bros. & Co., and with Renau in charge of the advertising matters of said firm. He states that he has read Renau's affidavit, and that it is true in its statements of facts.

Sage, J., delivered the following opinion:

After the presentation of the facts upon the hearing of the motion, the court called upon counsel for the defendants to state the grounds of their objections to the granting of an injunction. They first challenged the jurisdiction in equity, citing Kidd v. Horry, 28 Fed. Rep. 778; New York J. G. Soc. v. Roosevelt, 7 Daly, 188, 190; Prudential Assur. Co. v. Knott, L. R. 10 Ch. 142; Richter v. Journeymen Tailors Union, 24 Weekly Law Bulletin, 189; Mayer v. Journeymen Stonecutters Assn. (N. J.) 20 Atl. Rep. 492; Mogul S. S. Co. v. McGregor, L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 476, and Moore v. Bricklayers Union, No. 1, 28 Weekly Law Bulletin, 48.

Kidd v. Horry, supra, was an application to 12 L. R. A.

restrain the defendant by injunction from publishing certain circulars alleged to be libelous and injurious to complainants' patent-rights and business, and from making and uttering libelous and slanderous statements concerning the validity of complainants' letters-patent or their title thereto, or concerning their business, during the pendency of a suit to restrain the infringement of said patents. Justice Bradley, who decided the case, in the course of his opinion said that the application rested principally upon a line of recent English authorities, which depended on certain Acts of Parliament, and not on the general principles of equity jurisprudence, but that neither the statute law of this country, nor the well-considered judgment of a court, had introduced this new branch of equity into our jurisprudence. "There may be a case or two looking that way, but none that we deem of sufficient authority to justify us in assuming the jurisdiction. . . . We do not think that the existence of malice in publishing a libel, or uttering slanderous words, can make any difference in the jurisdiction of the court. Malice is charged in almost every case of libel, and no cases of authority can be found, we think, independent of statutes, in which the power to issue an injunction to restrain a libel or slanderous words has ever been maintained, whether malice was charged or not."

This case was approved and followed in Baltimore Wheel Co. v. Bemis, 29 Fed. Rep. 95, by Judges Colt and Carpenter, in the United States Circuit Court of Massachusetts. To the same effect, see Boston Diatite Co. v. Florence Mfg. Co. 114 Mass. 69. Mr. Justice Gray was then the chief justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, and pronounced the opinion, holding that "the jurisdiction of a court of chancery does not extend to cases of libel or of slander or of false representations as to the character or quality of the plaintiff's property, or as to his title thereto, which involve no breach of trust or of contract." Upon the authority of this case, and of Prudential Assur. Co. v. Knott, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts held in Whitehead v. Kitson, 119 Mass. 484, that there was no jurisdiction in equity to restrain a person falsely representing that the plaintiff's patent infringed a patent owned by himself, and thereby deterring others from purchasing the plaintiff's invention.

The case in 7 Daly was upon a motion to vacate a preliminary injunction, which had been granted, restraining the defendants, as members or visitors of the state board of charities, from publishing the proceedings before them in their inspection and examination, under the Statute, of the affairs and conduct of the complainant and its officers, which proceedings, it was averred, were secret and ex parte, the society having been excluded from being present by counsel, and not allowed to cross-examine witnesses or produce testimony on its own behalf, or to know even, except from the publications of the proceedings, what charges were made against it or its officers. The court held that, conceding the facts as stated, and that the matter published was defamatory and libelous, the defendants could not be restrained by a court of equity, and that those injured must seek their remedy by a civil action, or by an indictment.

ment in the criminal courts; the exercise of any equitable jurisdiction to restrain publications being repugnant to the constitutional provision that every citizen may fairly speak, write and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right; and that no law should be passed to restrain the liberty of speech and of the press.

In Prudential Assur. Co. v. Knott the court was asked to restrain the publication of a pamphlet which, it was charged, contained false statements of the rates of premium charged by complainant, and represented the company as being managed with reckless extravagance, and as being in a state of insolvency, and unable to fulfill its engagements; and it was averred that the continued publication would be very injurious to the company's credit, and could not fail greatly to damage its business and diminish its profits. Hall, V. C., refused to grant an injunction, and the plaintiff, by way of appeal, applied to Lord Cairns, L. C., who held that there was no ground whatever for the interference of the court; that if the publications did not amount to libels, and were therefore innocuous and justifiable in the eye of the court of common law, he was at a loss to understand upon what principle the court of chancery could interfere; and if, on the other hand, the comments were libelous, it was clearly settled that the court of chancery had no jurisdiction to restrain their publication.

In Richter v. Journeymen Tailors' Union a similar rule was applied. In that case the petition set forth that the defendants unlawfully combined and conspired to break up and destroy plaintiff's business, and that in order to accomplish that purpose they maliciously compelled plaintiff's employes to quit working for him, and prevented others from working for him. The means by which this was accomplished were not specified. "Whether it was done by moral suasion, by argument, by reason or by intimidation and violence, is not shown by either the petition or the evidence." All that did appear was that the defendants printed and published circulars, and that the plaintiff had lost customers because the latter had heard that plaintiff was employing scab or inferior tailors. It was not shown from what source the alienated customers derived their information, but it was assumed by counsel for the plaintiff that it was from the circulars. The court held that the only question before it was whether it could enjoin the publication of a libel, and that the only remedy against such publication was at law. To the same effect is Mayer v. Journeymen Stone Cutters' Assn. Indeed, the law as stated in all these cases is so thoroughly established as to be beyond controversy, and it is not necessary to refer more particularly to other cases cited in support of it. Francis v. Flinn, 118 U. S. 885, 30 L. ed. 165, is quite as strong an authority as any cited.

The question with which we have to deal is whether this case falls within the rule. That the defendant, the Typographical Union, set on foot a boycott against the complainant, as stated in the bill, and in the affidavits on file, is not denied. That this boycott was to be enforced by threatening loss of business to those who, having no connection with the Union, should continue to advertise with, or in any way patronize, the complainant, is clearly shown. True, it is claimed that no threats were used; but the language of the circulars has no doubtful meaning. The affidavits on file show that it was perfectly understood by those who received them; and the circumstances indicate that it was intended that it should be so understood. In Brace v. Beane (Pa.), 18 R. & Corp. L. J. 561, it was held that the word "boycott" is in itself a threat. "In popular acceptance it is an organized effort to exclude a person from business relations with others, by persuasion, intimidation and other acts which tend to violence, and thereby coerce him, through fear of resulting injury, to submit to dictation in the management of his affairs." But it is insisted for the defendants that every representation of fact contained in their hand-bills and circulars is true; that is to say, that the complainant had, in 1888, broken with the Typographical Union, discharged all union employes, and had since that date employed only those who were not members of the Union; and that after repeatedly promising to unionize his office he had finally, in September, 1890, refused to do so, and declared that he would not employ any person who was connected with the Union. All these are conceded facts. Therefore, argue counsel for the defendants, this is only a case of lawful competition. The complainant having declared that he would not employ any member of the Union, the Union had a right to say that its members would not patronize the complainant. Nobody disputes that proposition. If that were all that is involved in this case, there would be nothing for the court to act upon. But it is not all by any means. Instead of "fair, although sharp and bitter, competition," as is contended by counsel, it was an attempt, by coercion, to destroy all competition affecting the Union. It was an organized conspiracy to force the complainant to yield his right to select his own workmen, and submit himself to the control of the Union, and allow it to regulate prices for him, and to determine whom he should employ and whom discharge. In other words, it was and is an organized effort to force printers to come into the Union, or be driven from their calling for want of employment, and to make the destruction of the complainant's business the penalty for his refusing to surrender to the Union. Whatever moral obligation may have been incurred by complainant by reason of his promises to unionize his office, they were wholly without consideration, and they amount to nothing whatever in law or in equity.

No case has been cited where, upon a proper showing of facts, an unsuccessful appeal has been made to a court of chancery to restrain a boycott. The authorities are all the other way. At common law an agreement to control the will of employers by improper molestation was an illegal conspiracy. In New York it has been held that the "boycott" is a conspiracy in restraint of trade. People v. Wileig, 4 N. Y. Crim. R. 403; People v. Kostka, Id. 429. So also in Virginia: Com v. Shelton, 11 Va. L. J. 824. And in Connecticut: State v. Glidden, 55 Conn. 46, 3 New Eng. Rep. 849. And in England: Reg. v. Barrett, 18 L. J. 430.

In Emack v. Kans, 34 Fed. Rep. 47, the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois held that equity had jurisdiction to restrain an attempted intimidation by one issuing circulars threatening to bring suits for infringement against persons dealing in a competitor's patented article, the bill charging, and the proof showing, that the charges of infringement were not made in good faith, but with malicious intent to injure complainant's business. Judge Blodgett recognized, in his decision, the authority of Kidd v. Horry and Baltimore Wheel Co. v. Bemis, cited for the defendants in this case, but said that the case before him was fairly different and distinguishable from those cases in a material and vital feature. In those cases the interference of the court was sought to restrain the publication of libelous attacks upon the property of the complainant. In Emack v. Kans the gist of the complaint was that the publications were only means employed to carry into effect a malicious intent to injure and destroy the complainant's business. Judge Blodgett said: "I cannot believe that a man is remediless against persistent and continued attacks upon his business, such as have been perpetrated by these defendants against the complainant, as shown by the proofs in this case. It shocks my sense of justice to say that a court of equity cannot restrain systematic and methodical outrages like this by one man upon another's property rights. If a court of equity cannot restrain an attack like this upon a man's business, then the party is certainly remediless, because an action at law, in most cases, would do no good, and ruin would be accomplished before an adjudication would be reached. True, it may be said that the injured party has a remedy at law; but that might imply a multiplicity of suits, which equity often interposes to relieve from. But the still more cogent reason seems to be that a court of equity can, by its writ of injunction, restrain a wrongdoer, and thus prevent injuries which could not be fully redressed by a verdict and judgment for damages at law. Redress for a mere personal slander or libel may perhaps properly be left to the courts of law, because no falsehood, however gross and malicious, can wholly destroy a man's reputation with those who know him; but statements and charges intended to frighten away a man's customers, and intimidate them from dealing with him, may wholly break up and ruin him financially with no adequate remedy if a court of equity cannot afford protection by its restraining writ."

This is a clear and forcible statement of the law, and is in accord with the general current of authority.

How strongly it applies in this case may be readily seen by referring to the editorials in the Bulletin, the organ of the Union, and to the hand-bills and circulars set forth in the statement of facts. The editorial in the Bulletin of December 1 declares that the boycott "is still on, and will be until the proprietor of the 'rat' sheet employs union men." It requests "all K. of L. assemblies, unions and workmen to bear in mind that Mr. Casey refused to employ or in any way recognize organized labor." It asks their aid in compelling complainant to recognize the rights of labor by withdrawing their patronage from his paper, and if possible let him know why. It calls upon them not to patronize any merchants who advertise in complainant's newspaper, and if they see the paper in any place of business to refuse to buy goods unless the merchant immediately stops the "rat" sheet. The communication sent by the Union on the 2d of November to Messrs. Griffin, agents for the sale of complainant's paper, contains the following: "This Union will consider it a great favor for you to give up the agency of The Commonwealth. If you do not do so, we will have to consider you the enemy of organized labor."

These are fair samples, and they indicate the method by which the boycott was to be made effective. Yet counsel say that there were no threats; that the defendants were only exercising their constitutional right to freely speak and publish their opinions; that what defendants have done is a necessary and natural and proper incident of bitter, but yet lawful, competition, and that this was only fair argument and persuasion. These propositions are in direct conflict with decisions made long ago, and recognized in all subsequent cases. In Ree v. Eccles, 1 Leach, 274, the defendants were indicted for conspiring to impoverish a tailor, and by direct means to prevent him from carrying on his trade. They were convicted, and upon a motion in arrest of judgment it was objected that the indictment ought to have stated the acts that were committed to impoverish the tailor and to prevent him from carrying on his trade in order that the defendants might thereby have notice of the particular charges they were called upon to answer. But Lord Mansfield, without hearing the prosecution, said that that was certainly not necessary. "The offense does not consist in doing the acts by which the mischief is effected,—for they may be perfectly indifferent,—but the conspiring with a view to effect the intended mischief by any means. The illegal combination is the gist of the offense." See also Re Wabash R. Co. 24 Fed. Rep. 217. In that case the following notice was sent to various foremen of the shops of the railroad company, during a strike organized to resist a reduction of wages, the railroad company being at that time in the hands of a receiver appointed by the United States circuit court:

"OFFICE OF LOCAL COMMITTEE.

"June 17, 1886.

"—, Foreman: You are requested to stay away from the shop until the present difficulty is settled. Your compliance with this will command the protection of the Wabash employes. But in no case are you to consider this an intimidation."

"Held, that this was an unlawful interference with the management of the road by the receiver, and a contempt of court, for which the writer should be punished."

The court, in passing upon the case, said: "The statement in all these notices that they are not to be taken as intimidations goes to show beyond a doubt that the writer knew he was violating the law, and by this subterfuge sought to escape its penalty."

In United States v. Kans, 28 Fed. Rep. 748,

Judge Brewer, after stating that "every man has a right to work for whom he pleases, and go where he pleases, provided in so doing he does not trespass on the rights of others," by way of illustrating what is a threat, supposes that one of two workmen is discharged. The other is satisfied with his employment and wishes to stay. The discharged workman comes with a large party of his friends, armed with revolvers and muskets, and says: "Now my friends are here—you better leave—I request you to leave." In terms there is no threat, but it is a request backed by a demonstration of force, intended and calculated to intimidate, and the man leaves really because he is intimidated. Again, armed robbers stop a coach. One of their number politely requests the passengers to step out and hand over their valuables, and they do so. To the charge of robbery the defense is made that there was no violence; there were no threats; there was only a polite request, which was complied with. The court said that any judge who would recognize such a defense deserved to be despised, and the court was right.

In State v. Glidden, cited hereinbefore, Judge Carpenter, speaking for the Supreme Court of Connecticut, states that the defendants said in effect to the publishing company: "You shall discharge men you have in your employ, and you shall hereafter employ only such men as we shall name. It is true, we have no interest in your business; we have no capital invested therein; we are in no wise responsible for its losses or failure; we are not directly benefited by its success; and we do not participate in its profits—yet we have a right to control its management, and compel you to submit to our dictation."

The court said that the bare assertion of such a right was startling; that, if it existed, all business enterprises were alike subject to the dictation and control of those who asserted it, and upon the same principle and for the same reason the right to determine what business men shall engage in, and when and where and how it shall be carried on, will be demanded, and must be conceded to associations of workmen of the class of those whom it would be necessary to employ. The opinion in this case, although the case itself arose upon an indictment for conspiracy, is a well-considered discussion of the law with relation to boycotting. See also Old Dominion S. S. Co. v. McKenna, 30 Fed. Rep. 48.

In the light of these authorities it is idle to talk about the defendants' acts and publications as mere incidents of a competition set on foot by complainant's declaration that he would not employ union printers; that the publications are shielded by constitutional guarantees; or that, viewed in the most unfavorable light, they are nothing more than libels, and the only remedy for any injury resulting is by an action at law.

It is claimed that the recital in the affidavit of Davis of what was said to him by the managers of the advertising department of Mabley & Carew and of Fechheimer Bros. & Co., when they withdrew their patronage from The Commonwealth, to wit, that it was because they had been visited by a committee of the Typographical Union, and were threatened with the loss of business, ought not to be considered, because it is hearsay.

There are two answers to this claim:

First. What was said is clearly admissible as part of the res gestæ, to show the state of mind of the persons in doing the act which their declarations accompanied.

Second. Upon the hearing of a motion for a preliminary injunction, the rules of evidence are applied less strictly than upon the final hearing of the cause, and consequently evidence that would not be competent in support of an application for a perpetual injunction should be admitted. Buck v. Hermance, 1 Blatchf. 523; Matthews v. Iran Old Mfg. Co. 19 Fed. Rep. 321. The reason for the rule is plain. Probability of right is sufficient to authorize a preliminary injunction. In many cases it is granted to preserve property in statu quo during the pendency of a suit in which the rights to it are to be decided, and that without expressing, and oftentimes without having the means of forming, any opinion as to such rights. Great Western R. Co. v. Birmingham & O. J. R. Co. 2 Phil. Ch. 597.

The rule, with the reason for it, applies with peculiar force when it is sought to exclude the statements referred to from consideration. The advertising managers made haste to deny that any threats were uttered to them by anybody representing the Typographical Union. They did not, however, set forth what was said, nor did they deny that they withdrew their advertisements from The Commonwealth, nor intimate any reason for so doing other than that stated by Davis. It is not now the proper occasion to consider fully what prompted their denials. That should be reserved until the final hearing, after full opportunity to cross-examine Davis upon the one hand, and the advertising managers who made the denials upon the other hand, and to present to the court a full showing of all that was said when they were called upon by the committee of the Union. According to the logic of counsel for defendants almost anything might have been said without precluding the denials.

I have made the statement of the facts as they are set forth in the bill and affidavits quite full, and have entered somewhat at length upon the discussion of the questions involved, because of the request by counsel on both sides for a full statement of the case, with the reasons of the courts for its conclusions, inasmuch as the decision upon the motion may practically settle the entire controversy between the parties.

The motion for a temporary injunction, to continue in force until the final decree in this cause, will be granted.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of North Carolina, ex rel. Stacey
VAN AMRINGE, App't.,

v.

John D. TAYLOR.

(.....N. C. ....)

1. An election is not valid, although conducted fairly and honestly, if the statutory provisions and rules are not substantially observed.
2. A mere intruder, who without color of authority simply assumes to act as an officer, is not an officer de facto, where the public knew or ought to know that he is a usurper and his acts are absolutely void for all purposes.
3. An election held by a mere usurper of the office of registrar, who had fraudulently obtained the books and set up his claim to the office for the first time on election day, when the lawful registrar publicly demanded the return of the books, is void.

(March 24, 1891.)

APPPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Hanover County in favor of defendant in an action brought to contest defendant's alleged election to the office of clerk of the Superior Court for New Hanover County. Affirmed.

Statement by Merrimon, Ch. J.:

The relator alleges in his complaint that he was duly elected clerk of the Superior Court of the County of New Hanover at the regular election held in that county in November of 1890; that nevertheless the county canvassing board of that county falsely and wrongfully ascertained and declared that the defendant, who was his competitor at the said election, was duly elected to said office, and afterwards he was inducted into and now holds and exercises and receives the fees and emoluments thereof, and refuses to surrender the same, etc.; that the said board so ascertained by refusing to count the vote cast at Cape Fear precinct, in said county, which, if the same had been counted, as it ought to have been, would have given him a just and clear majority of the whole number of votes cast in said county, etc. He demands judgment that he was so duly elected; that defendant was not; that he be inducted into office, etc. The defendant denies that plaintiff was so elected clerk; alleges that he was; admits that if the vote which purported to be cast at the said Cape Fear precinct had been lawful, and had been counted by the said canvassing board, then the relator would have been elected; but he alleges that the said election at said precinct was absolutely void, because it was not held by a registrar and judges of election, according to law, etc. On the trial the court submitted to the jury this issue: "Was the plaintiff, relator, S. Van Amringe, duly elected to the office of clerk of the Superior Court of New Hanover County on the 4th day of November, 1890, and is he entitled to be inducted into said office?" There was a verdict and judgment for the defendant, and the relator appealed to this court, assigning as grounds of error: (3) The refusal of the court to submit issues offered by the relator. (4) Charging that if Thomas obtained the registration books fraudulently under promise to return them, and assumed to act as registrar, he was an intruder, and had no authority, and could perform no lawful official act, and in consequence the election held by him and his appointees was void. (5) In charging that if they found that Cowan continued to act as registrar, and employed Thomas, a clerk, to assist him, and that Thomas, while sustaining this relation fraudulently obtained, etc., as set out in above section No. 4.

Mr. D. L. Russell, for appellant:

Here was an election held by men possessing the insignia of office—the books and the boxes and the regular polling place. The electoral body, composed of both parties, recognized them as election officers by casting a full vote. General recognition is as good as color to constitute a de facto officer.

State v. Orrroll, 38 Conn. 449.

Thomas had color of appointment to act as registrar. The book was given to him by the lawful registrar "to represent him" on revision Saturday. On the morning of his appointment there were only two days of active service to be performed by the registrar—revision Saturday and election day. Thomas was appointed to act for the first day and held over wrongfully on the second. How does this differ in principle from the cases so often decided when the acts of an officer holding over after expiration of his term have been upheld?

Den v. Reddick, 4 Ired. L. 366; Wilcox v. Smith, 5 Wend. 281; Threadgill v. Carolina Cent. R. Co. 73 N. C. 178.

In almost every reported case in North Carolina the officer whose acts have been assailed has been held to be de facto, and hence his acts good as to third persons.

See People v. McKee, 68 N. C. 429; State v. Tate, 68 N. C. 546; People v. Staton, 73 N. C. 546; Keeler v. Newbern, Phil. L. 506.

The reasons of public policy upon which it is held that the acts of an officer de facto are not to be called in question collaterally, but are valid as to third persons, may apply to the case where such an officer is a usurper and intruder.

Petersilea v. Stone, 119 Mass. 467.

In face of the evidence of the de facto character exhibited by Thomas upon the day of the election no distinction can be drawn in respect to validity betwixt the votes of those voters that day who did and those who did not believe him to be the legal registrar.

Jewell v. Gilbert, 64 N. H. 13, 10 Am. St. Rep. 356.

The action of Thomas at the day of revision made his action on the day of election repeated action as registrar. And Coleridge, J., in Reg. v. Murphy, 8 Car. & P. 297, 309, said that even one previous official act (and that by an officer who had no insignia) was evidence to go to the jury of his right to do the act in question: and in State v. Hodgskins, 19 Mo. 155, 36 Am. Dec. 742, the test is said to be that the person whose official character is in question had been either "in the habit of acting, or had acted."

Messrs. Maraden Bellamy and George Rountree, for appellee:

An election held by usurpers is void.

Merrimon, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The ascertainment of the popular will or desire of the electors, under the mere semblance of an election unauthorized by law, is wholly without legal force or effect, because such election has no legal sanction. In settled, well-regulated government, the voice of electors must be expressed and ascertained in an orderly way, prescribed by law. It is this that gives order, certainty, integrity of character, dignity, direction and authority of government to the expression of the popular will. An election without the sanction of law expresses simply the voice of disorder, confusion and revolution, however honestly expressed. Government cannot take notice of such voice until it shall in some lawful way take on the quality and character of lawful authority. This is essential to the integrity and authority of government. Hence, if a person assumes to be a registrar of elections, and four others likewise assume to be judges of election, and purport and undertake to hold an election on election day, in an election precinct, and take and count the votes cast at it honestly, such action and proceeding would be no election, nor would it be accepted and treated as such by authority. An essential element of a valid election is that it shall be held by lawful authority, substantially as prescribed by law. It is not sufficient that it be simply conducted honestly; it must as well have legal sanction. The statutory provisions and regulations in respect to public elections in this State must be observed and prevail, certainly in their substance. Otherwise the election will be void, and so treated. Therefore the contention that if the election in question was simply conducted fairly and honestly it was valid, is unfounded.

The court instructed the jury that Thomas was registrar de facto, if they believed either of two aspects of the evidence, and the election would hence be valid. As to this there was no exception. But the court said further: "If you find from the evidence that Cowan continued to act as registrar, and employed Thomas as clerk to assist him, and that Thomas, while sustaining this relation to Cowan, fraudulently obtained possession of the books on the second Saturday preceding the election under a promise to return them, and assumed to act as registrar, he was an intruder, and had no authority, and could perform no lawful official act, and in consequence the election held by him and his appointees was void, and your answer to the issue should be 'No.'" This is made the principal ground of assignment of error. The instruction thus complained of must be taken in connection with the whole of the instructions given, and in view of all the evidence pertinent. The evidence tended to prove that one Cowan was duly appointed to be registrar; that he accepted the office, and acted as and claimed to be such continuously, until the day of the election; that he did not resign or profess to resign; that he did not appoint, or undertake to appoint, Thomas to be registrar; that he was employed and treated simply as his clerk; that Thomas fraudulently got the registration books from the registrar under the false promise to return the same; that he did not do so, but on the day of election expressly refused to surrender the registration books, and then assumed to be registrar, acted as such and undertook and purported to appoint three judges of election, who, with a judge regularly appointed, co-operated with him in holding the election. The evidence fully warranted the instruction, if it was correct in point of law. It is difficult to define in precise terms what constitutes an officer de facto in all cases. Indeed, what may constitute such officer in one case may not in another. A variety of facts and circumstances tending to show authority of the person claiming and exercising it go to constitute such officer, and, upon grounds of necessity and public policy, to give his acts validity as to the public and persons taking benefit of his official acts. There must be something, some consideration, evidence, facts, circumstances or conditions, that reasonably lead those persons who, in the course of the administration and the discharge of the duties of the office, must in some way have relations or business with it, to recognize and treat the person claiming to be officer as the lawful incumbent. But, as was said by Chief Justice Ruffin in Burke v. Elliott, 4 Ired. L. 361: "The mere assumption of the office by performing one or even several acts appropriate to it, without any recognition of the person as officer by the appointing power, may not be sufficient to constitute him an officer de facto. There must at least be some colorable election and induction into office ab origine, and so long an exercise of the office, and acquiescence therein of the public authorities, as to afford to the individual citizen a presumption strong that the party was duly appointed, and therefore that every person might compel him for the legal fees to do his business, and for the same reason was bound to submit to his authority as an officer of the country." What was thus said was afterwards approved in Den v. Reddick, 4 Ired. L. 368; Burton v. Patton, 2 Jones, L. 124; Trenton Comrs. v. McDaniel, 7 Jones, L. 107, and in People v. Staton, 73 N. C. 546, in which case Mr. Justice Reade said: "I scarcely think it necessary to cite authority to show the distinction between mere usurpers and officers de facto and de jure. A usurper is one who takes possession without any authority. His acts are utterly void, unless he continues to act for so long a time, or under such circumstances, as to afford presumption of his right to act. And then his acts are valid as to the public and third persons. But he has no defense in a direct proceeding against himself. A de facto officer is one who goes in under color of authority." Keeler v. Newbern, Phil. L. 505. In a late case (State v. Lewis, 107 N. C. 967, 11 L. R. A. 105) Justice Avery cites with approval State v. Carroll, 38 Conn. 449, in which Chief Justice Butler reviews very thoroughly and ably the whole subject of officers de facto, and reaches substantially this conclusion: "An officer de facto is one whose acts, though not those of an officer, the law, upon principles of policy and justice, will hold valid so far as they involve the interests of the public and third persons, when the duties of the office were exercised: first, without a known appointment or election, but under such circumstances of reputation or acquiescence as were calculated to induce people without inquiry to submit to or invoke his action, supposing him to be the officer he assumed to be; second, under color of a known and valid appointment or election, but where the officer has failed to conform to some precedent, requirement or condition, as to take an oath, give a bond, or the like; third, under color of a known election or appointment, void because the officer was not eligible, or because there was a want of power in the electing or appointing body, or by reason of some irregularity or defect in its exercise, such ineligibility, want of power or defect being unknown to the public; fourth, under color of an election or appointment by or pursuant to a public unconstitutional law, before the same is adjudged to be such."

This summary designates to a very large extent, if not altogether, the nature and extent of the circumstances, conditions, the character of the evidence and the recognition by the public essential in varying pertinent cases to constitute an officer de facto. A mere intruder or usurper is not ordinarily, but may become, an officer de facto in some cases. This can happen only by the continued exercise of the office by him, and the acquiescence therein by the public authorities and the public for such length of time as to afford to citizens generally a strong presumption that he had been duly appointed. But when, without color of authority, he simply assumes to act,—to exercise authority as an officer,—and the public know the fact, or reasonably ought to know, that he is a usurper, his acts are absolutely void for all purposes. The mere fact that, apart from his usurpation, his supposed official acts were fair and honest, could not impart to them validity and efficiency. Burke v. Elliott, People v. Staton and State v. Carroll, supra; McCrory, Elections, § 217; Paine, Elections, §§ 380, 381.

The citizen is justly chargeable with laches, does that which is in his own wrong and wrong to the public, when he recognizes, tolerates, encourages and sustains a mere usurper,—one whom he knows, or ought under the circumstances to know, to be such. In such case, neither justice, necessity nor public policy requires that the acts of the usurper shall be upheld as valid for any purpose. Indeed, these things, the spirit and purpose of government, strongly suggest the contrary. When, therefore, Thomas obtained from the registrar, Cowan, the registration books fraudulently, under promise to return the same, and assumed to act as registrar, he was simply an intruder, and had no authority and could perform no lawful official act as such, and the election which he and the supposed judges, his appointees, co-operating with him, held, was void. The instruction of the court to the jury excepted to was pertinent, and had reference to the evidence going to prove that Thomas so fraudulently obtained the registration books, and assumed to act as registrar, and the jury must have found that he did. The jury found that he was not registrar de facto, by reason of color of appointment. They found, also, that he was a fraudulent intruder; but they did not find, nor was there evidence to warrant such finding, that he was an intruder under such circumstances and conditions as to constitute him registrar de facto. The evidence went to show that he had been the clerk of the registrar; that he did not claim to be or act as registrar until the day of election; that he had no such reputation, that the electors had not so recognized him; that no public authority had so recognized him at any time; and that on the morning of the day of the election, in the presence of electors, the lawful registrar had publicly demanded that he surrender to him the registration books, to the end that he and the lawfully appointed judges of election might hold the election according to law, and he refused to do so. The evidence went to prove, and the jury found, that Thomas was a naked intruder, with no attending circumstances and conditions that rendered him registrar de facto. The electors had notice that Cowan was the lawful registrar; that he had been duly appointed; that he acted as such. There was no notice that he had resigned his office, nor had he done so. On the contrary, on the morning of the election he claimed his right and authority to hold the election. This was notice—important notice—that Thomas was an intruder, and the election was not such in contemplation of law. The electors ought not to have recognized the intruder; they did so in their own wrong; they ought to have demanded and required that the registrar, and the lawful judges of election, hold the election according to law. It was their duty to themselves and to the public to have done so, and, falling in this for any cause, they ought not to have gone through an empty form that had no legal effect. They lost their votes and their voice, in part, through their own laches.

The issue of fact submitted to the jury was broad and comprehensive. It embraced the whole of the matter at issue. The relator could readily, as he did, put in all pertinent evidence, and avail himself of it before the jury. He was not necessarily prejudiced by it, nor can we see, nor does it at all appear, that he was. The other exceptions are without merit.

Basil DEVEREUX

v.

Michael McMAHON et al., Appts.

(.....N. C. ....)

1. An objection that there is a variance between the original deed and a copy of its record, which copy is made evidence by Code, § 1251, without accounting for the original unless upon a rule or order of court suggesting a variance or other sufficient ground, and which has been read to the jury, cannot, in case of the subsequent voluntary production of the original without any order of court, be made available by objecting to the admission of the copy in evidence.

2. A cross-mark opposite a seal made by the grantor of a deed immediately under a clause containing his name and stating that he has "signed his name and affixed his seal," constitutes a sufficient signature and may be construed as an adoption of the name in such clause as a signature.
3. A mistake of the register of deeds in copying the true name of a witness to a deed on the records instead of the letters "D. S. C.," which constituted the actual signature of the witness, will not annul the probate or destroy the competency of a copy of the record as evidence.
4. The letters "D. S. C.," written by the witness to a deed, whose name is Solomon Davis, may constitute a sufficient signature as a witness.
5. The signing of a deed by the grantor and its possession by the grantee constitute prima facie evidence of delivery.

(February 24, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Halifax County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. As affirmed.

Statement by Avery, J.:

This was a civil action, brought for the recovery of possession of land, and tried at September Term, 1890, of the Superior Court of Halifax County before Armfield, J.

The plaintiff was introduced as a witness, and testified that the land was worth $40 or $50 a year. On cross-examination by the defendants' counsel he testified that Thomas Alexander was carried by him from his home in Halifax County to the plaintiff's home in Nash County, in order that he might take better care of him. "Tom wanted to go. He died about a week afterwards. He signed the deed about 12 o'clock in the day, and died about the same hour that night. They tried to read the deed to him, but he said it made no difference. He asked who wrote it, and was told it was Mr. Thorp. He asked if he was a lawyer, and was told 'Yes.' They tried to read it to him, but could not make it out. He asked if it stipulated that he (Basil) should take care of him and Frankie during their lives. Was told 'Yes;' and said that he was satisfied. I told him what was in the deed. Solomon Davis was the one who tried to read the deed. John Cobb was not then present. Davis witnessed the deed. Cobb came later in the day, and Tom acknowledged the deed again before him, and he wrote these words on it: 'John Cobb witness towards of what was ~~sd.~~ Thomas Alexander did agree to the Deed.'" The plaintiff then rested his case.

NOTE.—Deed; signature by mark or cross.

If a person is designated by his proper name in the body of a deed, the fact that he signs by a wrong name will not invalidate the deed. Middleton v. Finley, 23 Cal. 73.

—So a signature by a mark or cross is sufficient, the deed being in other respects regular, although the vendor could write. Bickley v. Keenan, 60 Ala. 295; Truman v. Lore, 14 Ohio St. 144; Frost v. Deering, 12 L. R. A.

21 Me. 186; Jackson v. Van Dusen, 5 Johns. 144; Tonelle v. Hall, 4 N. Y. 145.

So the absence of an attestation to such a signature would not detract from its sufficiency, although it might have the effect to render proof of the execution of the instrument much more difficult. Wimberly v. Dallas, 52 Ala. 196; Bailey v. Bailey, 36 Ala. 687. See 3 Washb. Real Prop. 244; Baker v. Dening, 8 Ad. & El. 94.

The defendants offered the paper purporting to be the original deed from Alexander to Devereux. In the attestation clause the words "Solomon Davis" are not written out, but the letters "D. S. C." are followed by certain flourishes. The defendants then introduced the will of Thomas Alexander, in which he devised the locus in quo to the defendants. The defendant M. McMahon was then introduced, who testified that he had known Thomas Alexander twenty-five or thirty years, and had had considerable dealings with him, and he could not read or write. The defendants then introduced W. T. Purnell, who testified that he knew Tom Alexander well. Saw him at Halifax depot on the day that he went to Nash. Tried to talk to him, but he was so sick that he could not talk,—was paralyzed,—and witness thought that he was dead. Was just as bad off as a man could be. His feet had been badly burned. He was at the depot in a bed, and feathers were all over him. W. D. Willcox was introduced by the defendants, and testified: "I saw Tom the day he was carried to Nash. He was in a bed. Looked very bad." Defendants then introduced Alfred Walters, who testified that the day before he left home he saw Tom Alexander, and helped to dress him on the morning he left. "He did not speak from his home to Halifax. He said that he would be back to-morrow. He was as bad off as he could be when I left him on the train. Tom is an uncle of the plaintiff, and raised him. Tom had no children. I married Tom's niece." Defendants rest.

The testimony of Solomon Davis, who was next introduced for plaintiff, is embodied in the opinion. Plaintiff introduced Simon Beckett, who testified: "I was there when Tom signed the deed. I got there about 11 o'clock. Tom talked with good sense. I saw Tom take the pen and have the paper. His mind seemed good then. He was talking about being burned; how he came to be there; said Basil would do more for him than anyone else, etc. I saw Basil give him the deed, and having it fixed up by Mr. Thorp. He said it was to be signed to-morrow. Tom said: 'Better fix it now; we can't tell what a day may bring forth.' Tom asked him what was in the deed, and Basil told him. I [witness] can't read or write. Tom was in the bed when he signed the deed. Davis had hold of the end of the pen when Tom signed." Plaintiff then introduced Nat. Alexander, who testified: "I am an illegitimate son of Tom Alexander. Before he went to Nash County he proposed to me to take him to my house, and take care of him and his sister, Frankie, during their lives, and he would give me a deed to the land. I told him I was not able to do it, and he said he was going to write for Basil to come. He wrote to Basil, and after that Basil came. He did not take him home that time, but did shortly after." Defendants objected to this. The objection overruled, and defendants excepted. The defendants objected, among other things, throughout the trial, that the deed was never signed; and, secondly, that plaintiff fraudulently induced Alexander to sign it. The plaintiff then introduced John Williams, who testified he had heard Tom say McMahon had failed to take care of him. Said he was going to write

Basil to come and take him in hand. Said he hadn't seen Basil in twelve years. This was in 1886. Basil came in 1887. The plaintiff was recalled, and testified that three or four years before Tom died he came up and attended to his matters for him; that he took Tom off just before Christmas, and he lived one week, and until Friday night of the next week. Mr. Thorp testified that he wrote the paper on the 18th and dated it on the 14th; that he gave the deed to Basil on the 18th. Defendants then introduced McMahon, who said that Basil's statement that he was inattentive to Tom's wants was false; that he did not know he was at the depot the day he went to Nash; and that he had several times sent him clothing and other things. The defendant's counsel claimed in his argument (1) that there was no sufficient signing of said deed or paper; (2) that it was not lawfully and properly registered; (3) that there was no evidence of its delivery. His honor charged the jury that if they found from the evidence that Thomas Alexander, after being made acquainted with the contents of the paper or deed, with intent to execute it, made the cross-mark opposite the word "[Seal]" freely and voluntarily, and then had sufficient mental capacity to understand the nature of the transaction and the situation of the property, and his circumstances, it was in law a sufficient signing. Defendants excepted. He further charged that if the jury believed from the evidence that Solomon Davis was in the habit of signing his name by the letters "D. S. C.," and made his signature in this way to said deed, at the request of Thomas Alexander, it was a sufficient attestation. Defendants excepted. His honor further charged that if the jury believe from the evidence that Alexander signed the deed for the purposes expressed, and Davis, after signing as a witness, handed it to Devereux, in his presence, and with his assent, or if Alexander handed it to Devereux, there was some evidence of delivery to be considered by them. Defendants excepted. Verdict for the plaintiff. Defendants move for a new trial for alleged errors above set forth. Motion refused. Defendants except. The material portions of the original deed and of the record in the registrar's office are incorporated in the opinion.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is provided by statute (Code, § 1251) that "the registry or a duly certified copy of the record of any deed, etc., may be given in evidence in any court, and shall be held to be full and sufficient evidence of such deed, etc., although the party offering the same shall be entitled to the possession of the original, and shall not account for the non-production thereof unless, upon a rule or order of the court suggesting some material variance from the original in such registry, or other sufficient ground, such party shall have been previously required to produce the original, in which case the same shall be produced, or its absence duly accounted for, according to the course and practice of the court." After the plaintiff had read the deed recorded in the register's book, which was made competent evidence by the Statute, he furnished at the request of the defendant, voluntarily, and not in obedience to an order of the court, the original. The latter could not then avail himself of the objection that there was a variance between the original and what purported to be a copy on the book of the register by objecting to the admission in evidence of the copy. If there had been any ground of complaint, the point intended to be raised was fairly presented by the exceptions to the charge of the court at a later stage of the trial, the defendant having meantime offered the original deed in evidence. The last clause of the original deed, and the attestation clause with signatures, were as follows:

"In witness whereof, the said Thomas Alexander hath hereunto signed his name and affixed his seal the day and date above written.

× [Seal.]

"Signed, sealed and delivered in presence of × John Cobb, witness towards of what was sed, Thomas Alexander did agree to the Deed. D. S. C."

The same portion of the deed was recorded in the register's office as follows:

"In witness whereof, the said Thomas Alexander hath hereunto signed his name and fixed his seal the day and date above written.

"Witness: × [Seal.]

"Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of × John Cobb, witness toward of what was sed, Thomas Alexander did agree to the deed. Solomon Davis."

The defendant contended that the deed was not signed in accordance with the requirements of our Statute of Frauds (Code, § 1554), 12 L. R. A.

and that the judge below should have instructed the jury that the plaintiff had failed to adduce any evidence tending to show title in himself, and could not, therefore, recover.

Under the Saxon rule in England, it was only required that deeds should be subscribed with the sign of the cross. It was not necessary that a seal should be attached. After the Norman conquest, sealing became a requisite, but signing of all kinds ceased to be required. 3 Washb. Real Prop. 242; Co. Litt. 171b; 2 Bl. Com. 309.

After the Statute of Frauds was enacted it became essential that every deed purporting to convey land, and every other instrument required under its provisions to be in writing, should be signed by the party to be charged therewith. It is now an established rule that the name of the party to be charged may be written by an agent, in his presence, and under his direction; the act of the authorized agent being theoretically the act of the principal. Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 807; Pierce v. Hakes, 23 Pa. 281; Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Brown, 30 N. J. Eq. 193; Browne, Stat. Fr. 12; Kims v. Brooks, 9 Ired. L. 218; Frost v. Deering, 21 Me. 156; Gardner v. Gardner, 5 Cush. 483.

Under the provisions of our Statute (Code, § 1554) all of the instruments enumerated are required to be in writing, and signed by the party, etc., while in the statutes of some of the other States the word "subscribed" is substituted for "signed." Modern text-writers generally concur in the opinion that it is not essential that the signature should be placed at the end of the deed or other instrument, where the law requires signing only. Martindale, Conv. § 6; 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 441; Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 807.

In the construction of statutes in reference to wills a similar rule has been generally adopted. Signatures in the body of the will have been declared to constitute a sufficient compliance with the requirement that there should be a signing, and the courts have gone so far as to sustain the validity of the execution of a will where the name of the testator was written under the names of the witnesses to the attestation clause after having been written also as a part of that clause by him. 7 Mews, Com. Law Dig. 879; 1 Wms. Exrs. 60.

It is conceded that, where another person has already written the signature of one who is illiterate, the latter may adopt the signing subsequently by attaching a cross or other mark used by him as a substitute for an actual signature, though he could not so ratify the act of an agent who signed his name not in his presence except by attaching such mark. The grantor in this case inquired who had written the deed, and was told that it was written by Mr. Thorp, a lawyer, and, in substance, what were its contents. It was insisted with much force by the learned counsel on the argument that when Thomas Alexander made the cross-mark opposite to the seal and beneath the clause reciting his name, he adopted the signing of his name in that clause, the name being in close proximity to the cross and seal. It is well established that any number of grantors may by delivery adopt a seal opposite to the name of the first of the number, who signs the deed, there being a recital in it that they had attached their seals; while, on the other hand, where there is no such recital, a seal attached to the name will be deemed sufficient to constitute the instrument a deed. 8 Washb. Real Prop. 244, 245; Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 808; Tarborough v. Monday, 2 Dev. L. 496.

It seems not unreasonable to be guided by the principle so often invoked in the construction of deeds and wills, that the law will favor those who are inopis consilii and illiterate, and attempt to arrive at and carry out their true intent by a liberal application of technical rules. Washburn, supra, at page 244, says: "Affixing a mark by the grantor against his name, though written by another, is a signing, although it do not appear that he could not write his own name."

It being settled, then, that our Statute does not require that the name should be subscribed at the end of the instrument, when written by the party to be charged in his own handwriting, it would seem to be an unreasonable discrimination against, instead of in favor of, an illiterate person to declare his conveyance null and void because he attempted, by a mark placed in proximity to the seal, at the end of the deed, to adopt a signing of his name in the last clause of the instrument. The courts, since the enactment of the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. II.), have used the maxim "qui facit per alium, facit per se," with great liberality, especially in making auctioneers, by implication of law, the agents of those who bid for land at sales. In construing the act of making the mark in this case as an adoption of the signature just above it in the body of the deed, we can foresee no greater danger of opening a door for the evasion of the Statute of Frauds than in any other case where the mark is used and placed in juxtaposition to the written name. In either case the execution of the instrument must be ordinarily shown by the acknowledgment of the maker, or the testimony of a witness who saw it made, and even where both the maker and subscribing witness may have died, the necessity for proving the genuineness of the signature of the witness, or some distinguishing feature in the mark made by the grantor, is an ample guaranty that the opportunity or incentive to evade the Statute of Frauds will not be enhanced by sustaining the validity of the signing by Thomas Alexander. Davis v. Higgins, 91 N. C. 383.

If there had been no witness to the deed, then it could not have been admitted to probate without proof that the mark was habitually used by Alexander as a substitute for signing his name, and that there was some peculiarity in its appearance which distinguished it from other marks, and enabled the witness to recognize it as he would the peculiarities of handwriting. Sellers v. Sellers, 98 N. C. 16; State v. Byrd, 93 N. C. 624; Howell v. Ray, 92 N. C. 510.

In support of this view Justice Merrimon, delivering the opinion of the court in State v. Byrd, supra, said: "While, generally, a mere cross-mark employed by a person who cannot write as evidence that he executed a paper writing to which it is affixed cannot be proven, yet a person may have a mark so peculiar and so uniformly used by him for such purpose as that it may become well known as his mark, and may be proven, just as the signature of one who writes may be proven to be in his own handwriting. A mark like the signature of a party is intended to be evidence of the fact that the party making it made it, and identifies himself with the paper writing signed in the way and for the purpose indicated in it; and it is just as binding ordinarily without a subscribing witness as with one, but it may be proven, as a signature may be by one who saw it made, or who heard the maker acknowledge it to be his, and the maker himself is generally a competent witness to prove that he made it." Howell v. Ray, 92 N. C. 510.

We have reproduced this extract to make it clear that we are sustained by an adjudication of this court, in which it is laid down as a principle, in the most explicit way, that an instrument purporting to be a deed, and required to be in writing and signed by the party charged thereby, is not void upon its face because the maker or grantor has signed by making a simple cross, nor even if there is no witness to such signing. The law still leaves the way open for proof of its execution by showing it to be a peculiar substitute habitually used by the grantor, instead of an ordinary signature, or for evidence from an eye-witness that he saw the mark attached, just as he could testify to the act of subscribing the name. Our view of the subject is sustained by reason and the current of authority. While it is not probable that any case precisely similar in all respects to that under consideration has ever arisen, the principle announced finds abundant support in the adjudications of other courts, and the conclusions deduced from them by leading writers upon the subject of deeds and conveyances. 5 Lawson, Rights, Remedies and Practice, § 2270, says a person physically unable or too illiterate to write his name may sign by making a cross, a straight or crooked line, a dot or any other symbol. In Martindale, Conv., § 190, the rule is stated as follows: "As to what will constitute a sufficient signing, it may be observed that it is not necessary that the party should write his own name. His mark is sufficient though he be able to write." In section 6 the same author says: "It seems that putting initials to a document, the name appearing elsewhere, is a sufficient signing to satisfy the requirements of the Statute." If the initial letters of one's name be allowed to serve as a substitute for a formal signature because the name is signed in full in the body of the deed, why should we hold that a mark, the making or distinctive character of which is susceptible of proof, is insufficient under similar circumstances?

The second ground of exception was that the deed was not lawfully and properly registered. The certificate of probate and fiat are as follows: "State of North Carolina, Nash County. I, John T. Morgan, clerk of the superior court, do hereby certify that the execution of the annexed deed was this day proven before me by the oath and examination of Solomon Davis, the subscribing witness thereto, who says that the deed was signed and delivered in his presence, January 13, 1888, to the grantee for the purposes therein expressed. Witness my hand and official seal, this 20th day of January, 1888." (Signed and sealed by the clerk.) "State of North Carolina, Halifax County. In the superior court, February 9, 1888. The foregoing certificate of John T. Morgan, Clerk of the Superior Court of Nash County, duly attested by his official seal, is adjudged to be correct: Let the instrument, with the certificates, be registered. [Signed] John T. Gregory, Clerk Superior Court." "Filed for registration, February 9, 1888. [Signed] L. Vinson, Register of Deeds."

If the objection to the probate is based upon the ground that the original deed shows that Solomon Davis, instead of signing his full name to the attestation, wrote the letters "D. S. C.," and the register recorded the signature "Solomon Davis," we think it is clearly untenable. Registrations are not rendered void by reason of a mistake by the officer in recording deeds, but the registration is presumptively correct; and the remedy for such defective record is to demand the original, which, if legible, is the highest evidence of the form of the deed and probate. Davis v. Inacos, 84 N. C. 386; Loe v. Harbin, 87 N. C. 249.

When this case was brought to this court by a former appeal, Devereux v. McMahon, 102 N. C. 284, we held that the fact that a witness had made a cross-mark in attesting a deed did not affect his competency to prove its execution. See also 5 Lawson, Rights, Remedies and Practice, § 2271; Nelius v. Brickell, 1 Hayw. 19.

Upon the principle already announced in discussing the signature of the grantor, there can be no further controversy as to his eligibility when it appears that he used characters so peculiar, as a substitute for signing his name. Tatom v. White, 95 N. C. 458; State v. Byrd and Sellers v. Sellers, supra; Martindale, Conv. § 6. His testimony was as follows: "I witnessed the deed. I saw Tom sign the deed, and he handed it to me, and asked me to witness it. That is my name. D. S. for Davis, C. for Solomon. That is the way I sign it. The rest was put there merely to fill in. I thought the old man was in his right mind. I did not hear anyone read the deed to Tom. Tom asked Basil if he had got the deed fixed up. He said 'Yes.' Tom asked who fixed it. He said, 'Mr. Thorp, a lawyer;' and told him what was in it. Tom signed the deed about twelve o'clock in the day, and died about twelve o'clock that night. I handed the deed either to Basil, in Tom's presence, or back to Tom, and he handed it to Basil."

We think that, though there was a mistake in recording the deed, it did not affect the right given by statute to the plaintiff to read the record, as already stated, subject to the right of defendant, if the original could be produced, to correct such mistakes by its introduction. The deed was properly proven by Solomon Davis, who was a competent witness. The effect of showing the mistake of the register of deeds was not to annul the probate, not even to destroy the competency of the copy upon the book as evidence, but simply to rebut the presumption that the copy was correct, and open the way for the consideration and discussion of the question whether the paper writing, in its original shape, was upon its face an instrument that under our statute might be probated and admitted to registration. Defendant's counsel insisted that there was no evidence of delivery. Though neither proof of possession of the deed by the grantees alone, nor evidence of the handwriting of the bargainor, unconnected with the facts, will raise a presumption of delivery, so as to dispense with actual proof of it, yet, when both the signing by the grantor and possession of the grantees are shown, there is prima facie evidence of delivery. Williams v. Springs, 7 Ired. L. 884; Whitell v. Mebane, 64 N. C. 345; Ingram v. Hall, 1 Hayw. 198.

But the witness Davis testified that when the deed was handed to him by the grantor he either handed it, in his presence, and with his acquiescence, to the grantee, Basil Devereux, or he returned it to Alexander, who handed it to Devereux. That was evidence, if believed, of an actual delivery. The failure to read a deed, or the misrecital of its contents to an illiterate grantor, who asks to know what it contains, constitutes a fraud in the factum, and on proof of the facts the instrument was formerly treated as void in a court of law, and can now be attacked without initiating a direct proceeding to impeach it. But where a grantee, though an illiterate man, does not demand that the deed shall be read, and all of the testimony tends to show that a witness told him in substance what its provisions were, there is no evidence of fraud to be submitted to the jury. School Committee v. Keeler, 67 N. C. 448; Nicholls v. Holmes, 1 Jones, L. 360; Canoy v. Troutman, 7 Ired. L. 155.

There is no error, and the judgment must be affirmed.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

Charles C. BRACE, Admr., etc., of Ella A. Rouse, Deceased,
v.

Mary E. CHARTRAND et al., Appts.

(.... Colo. ....)

*1. The society known as the "Ancient Head notes by HAYT, J.

NOTE.—Certificates of membership in benefit society in effect insurance policies.

A certificate issued by a mutual aid society entitled I. R. A.

"Order of United Workmen," so far as it is engaged in the business of life insurance, must be treated in law as a mutual life insurance company.

2. The certificate of insurance is to be regarded as a written contract, and, so far as it goes, it is the measure of the rights of all parties.

3. It is the policy of the law to favor vested, rather than contingent, estates.

ting the holder on his death to $1,000 to be paid from a fund to be raised by assessments is in legal effect a policy of life insurance. Elkhart Mut. Aid

4. A policy of life insurance is in the nature of a testament, and, although not a testament, in construing it the courts will so far as possible treat it as a will.

5. Under a certificate providing that upon the death of a member the insurance shall be paid to his wife, and in case of her death to his children, the right to the fund vests in the surviving wife immediately upon the death of the husband, and upon her death the fund passes to the administrators as a part of her estate.

APPPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Boulder County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an insurance policy, in which defendant had paid the money into court and procured other claimants of the fund to be substituted in its stead. Affirmed.

Statement by Hayt, J.:

It appears from the record in this case that *An opinion was handed down in this case April 12, 1890, reversing the judgment below. After a rehearing the court withdrew from its former position and affirmed the judgment of the lower court. The former opinion therefore becomes unimportant, especially since the material portions of it are set out in the dissenting opinion, and it is therefore omitted. [Rep.]

B. & R. Asso. v. Houghton, 1 West. Rep. 224, 108 Ind. 224.

Whatever may be the terms of payment of the consideration by the assured or the mode of estimating or securing payment of the insurance money, it is still a contract of insurance by whatever name it may be called. Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 149; State v. Farmers & M. Mut. Benev. Asso. 18 Neb. 281.

Where the primary purpose of the association of the Ancient Order of United Workmen is to provide a beneficiary fund to be paid on the death of each member, and the avowed fraternal character of the organization is merely incidental thereto, it is a life insurance company. State v. Bankers & M. Mut. B. Asso. 23 Kan. 499; Folmer's App. 87 Pa. 138; Illinois Mason's Ben. Soc. v. Winthrop, 36 Ill. 537; Illinois Mason's Ben. Soc. v. Baldwin, 36 Ill. 479; State v. St. Louis Citizen's Ben. Asso. 6 Mo. App. 163; Bolton v. Bolton, 73 Me. 299; Bacon, Ben. Societies, § 51.

Distinction between certificate and life policy.

The essential difference between a certificate of membership in a beneficiary association and a life policy is, that in the latter the rights of the beneficiary are fixed by the terms of the policy, while in the former they depend upon the certificate and the rights of the member under the constitution and by-laws of the society. Holland v. Taylor, 9 West. Rep. 608, 111 Ind. 131; Hellenberg v. District No. 1 of Ind. Order of B. B. 94 N. Y. 589; Kentucky Mas. Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Miller, 13 Bush. 499; Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 149; Masonic Mut. Ben. Asso. v. Burkhart, 7 West. Rep. 529, 110 Ind. 189.

In the one case the rights of the beneficiary are fixed and vested from the moment the policy takes effect. In the other they are subject to such changes as the law of the association authorizes the member to make. All that a beneficiary has during the lifetime of the member, owing to his right of revocation, is a mere expectancy dependent upon the will and pleasure of the holder of the certificate. This expectancy is not property. Durian v. Central Verein of Hermann's 85th Regt. 7 Daly. 168; Tennessee Lodge v. Ladd, 5 Lea. 716; Swift v. Railway Pass. & F. C. Mut. Aid & Ben. Asso. 96 Ill. 309; Knights of Honor v. Watson, 6 New Eng. Rep. 883, 64 N. H. 517; Supreme Conclave Royal Adelpheia v. Cappella, 41 Fed. Rep. 1.

A life policy for the benefit of the family, though not a testament, is in the nature of a testament, and in construing it the courts should treat it, as far as possible, as a will. Duval v. Goodson, 79 Ky. 224; Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Palmer, 42 Conn. 65; Thomas v. Leake, 67 Tex. 469; National Asso. of the Nat. Am. Asso. v. Kirgin, 28 Mo. App. 80.

As wills take effect upon the death of the testator and are treated as speaking from that time (Shotts v. Poe, 47 Md. 513; Davidson v. Dallas, 14 Ves. Jr. 576), so by analogy upon the death of the member of a benevolent association the benefit certificate takes effect so far as to vest in the beneficiary an absolute right to the benefit money. Union Mut. Asso. v. Montgomery, 14 West. Rep. 377, 70 Mich. 337; Thomas v. Leake, 67 Tex. 469.

On December 30, 1886, said Starling D. Rouse died, leaving his said wife and children him surviving. In less than one month thereafter, January 28, 1887, and before any portion of the insurance money had been paid to the wife, she also died. Appellee, Braca, having certificates. This expectancy is not property. Durian v. Central Verein of Hermann's 85th Regt. 7 Daly. 168; Tennessee Lodge v. Ladd, 5 Lea. 716; Swift v. Railway Pass. & F. C. Mut. Aid & Ben. Asso. 96 Ill. 309; Knights of Honor v. Watson, 6 New Eng. Rep. 883, 64 N. H. 517; Supreme Conclave Royal Adelpheia v. Cappella, 41 Fed. Rep. 1.

A life policy for the benefit of the family, though not a testament, is in the nature of a testament, and in construing it the courts should treat it, as far as possible, as a will. Duval v. Goodson, 79 Ky. 224; Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Palmer, 42 Conn. 65; Thomas v. Leake, 67 Tex. 469; National Asso. of the Nat. Am. Asso. v. Kirgin, 28 Mo. App. 80.

As wills take effect upon the death of the testator and are treated as speaking from that time (Shotts v. Poe, 47 Md. 513; Davidson v. Dallas, 14 Ves. Jr. 576), so by analogy upon the death of the member of a benevolent association the benefit certificate takes effect so far as to vest in the beneficiary an absolute right to the benefit money. Union Mut. Asso. v. Montgomery, 14 West. Rep. 377, 70 Mich. 337; Thomas v. Leake, 67 Tex. 469.

The general rule applicable to beneficiary or charitable associations is that the beneficiary acquires no vested right to the benefits which are to accrue upon the death of a member until the death of the member occurs. During his lifetime the member may therefore exercise the power of appointment, without other limits or restrictions except such as are imposed by the Organic Law, or by rules and regulations of the society, duly adopted in compliance therewith. *Splawn v. been appointed administrator of said Ella A. Rouse, commenced this suit in the county court against the Order of United Workmen, to recover the insurance, as part of said Ella's estate. The children named in the certificate also claimed the benefit of the insurance. The defendant appeared, and requested to be permitted to deposit said sum of $2,000, "subject to the order of the court, according to the very right of the case;" and it was accordingly so ordered, and the defendant was dismissed as a party. Mary E. Chartrand, formerly Mary E. Rouse, Clara D. Rouse and Anna L. Rouse, minors (said last two appearing by John H. Nicholson, their guardian), were substituted as parties to the action in place of defendant, for the purpose of enabling them to assert in this action their claim to the insurance money. Judgment having been rendered in the county court, the action was appealed to the district court, where an amended answer was filed in behalf of said children and their guardian, claiming the insurance money. The amended answer shows, inter alia, that the children named in the certificate of insurance are the children of said Starling D. Rouse by his first wife, who died many years before; that they were his only children, and with his said wife, Ella, were the only members of his family dependent upon him for support; that his said wife, Ella, was, and had been for years, an invalid, and left no surviving children. The amended answer further shows: "That said Grand Lodge of the A. O. U. W. is a voluntary beneficiary association, not incorporated; that its constitution and laws in force at the time said Starling D. Rouse became a member, and when he died, provided, among other things, that the beneficiary or beneficiaries named in the certificates issued to members should be confined to one or more of the family of the members, or some person or persons related to him by blood, or who shall be dependent upon him; that the amount of the beneficiary certificate upon the death of its members shall be collected by assessments upon its members, the assessment to be made upon the first day of the next month after receiving notice from the recorder of the lodge of which the deceased was a member, and payment by the members is voluntary, and cannot be enforced, except by suspension of the members; that notice of the death of said Starling D. Rouse was received by the grand recorder of the said Grand Lodge of the A. O. U. W., January 11, 1887; that the assessment to pay the beneficiaries named in his certificate was not in fact made until and on March 1, 1887, and the money to pay the same was not collected and in the treasury of said grand lodge, and proper officers ready to draw warrant and pay the same, until the 27th day of March, 1887."

Upon motion of the administrator, the district court rendered judgment upon the pleadings in his favor, from which judgment this appeal is taken.

Meurs. Charles M. Campbell and James M. North, for appellants:

Ella A. Rouse, the wife of the assured, dying before the assessment was made to pay the beneficiary certificate, the contract to pay the fund, when collected, to the children, was complete, and the money, when due and collected by the process marked out in the laws of the order, was payable to them.

Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 84 Conn. 805; Richmond v. Johnson, 28 Minn. 447.

The vesting in this case was not and could not be until the fund was in esse; then, when received by said grand lodge it vested in the children and should have been paid to them.

Chapin v. Fellowes, 86 Conn. 182, 4 Am. Rep. 49; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 84 Conn. 805. See Re Protectives F. Ins. Co. 9 Biss. 188; May, Ins. § 550, and note.

In cases like this courts will construe the rules and regulations of an association like the A. O. U. W. liberally, in order to effect its benevolent purpose.

Contracts should be so construed as to give effect to the intention of the parties, and when that intention is sufficiently apparent, effect should be given to it, even though violence be thereby done to its words; for greater regard is to be given to the clear intent of the parties than to any particular words they may have used in the expression of their intent.

Granting that the fund did vest in Mrs. Rouse at the instant of S. D. Rouse's decease, which vesting would meet and satisfy the settled policy of the law, it was subject to be divested and was divested by her dying not having used it, sold it or touched it, and appellants then and ever since surviving and being named in the contract. Courts in construing wills will give due regard to the natural impulses and feelings of mankind.

Henry v. Thomas, 118 Ind. 28.

The paramount object to be reached in the construction of a will by a court, is so to construe it as to express the true intention and meaning of the testator.

See Kilgore v. Kilgore and Hills v. Bernard, supra.

In Oyster v. Knull, supra, we read: "A testator bequeathed to his son a farm 'for his support and if he should be spared to have family I desire the above estate to go to the use of his children.' Held that the son took a life estate only . . . also that the word 'children' in a will is primarily and generally a word of purchase."

Mr. Oscar F. A. Greene, for appellee:

The certificate in a benefit association is a contract.

National Ben. Assn. of Indianapolis v. Bowman, 9 West. Rep. 186, 110 Ind. 855.

It is the business of the courts to pass on the rights of parties as they find them, and not to make contracts for parties.

Blatchley v. Coles, 6 Colo. 349.

The argument that this contract is to have some peculiar method of construction on account of the manner of the payment of the benefit and on account of the benevolent character of the lodge is not tenable.

Aurora F. Ins. Co. v. Eddy, 49 Ill. 106; Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 149; Wiggin v. Knights of Pythias, 81 Fed. Rep. 123.

A written contract of insurance must be taken to contain all the essential elements of the contract and no verbal agreement made before or at the time of the written contract is admissible to vary its terms.

National Mut. Ben. Assn. v. Heckman, 86 Ky. 254.

When the assured dies the right to the benefit vests at once in the properly designated beneficiary.

Richmond v. Johnson, 28 Minn. 447; St. Clair County Benev. Soc. v. Fietsam, 97 Ill. 474.

With the vesting of the right in the wife, the operative purpose of the lodge was exhausted in the premises. After such vesting it mattered not what became of the woman or money so far as any contract with the lodge was concerned.

See Maneely v. Knights of Birmingham, 7 Cent. Rep. 683, 115 Pa. 305.

Even on the assumption that the alleged intention did exist in the mind of the assured at the time of the execution of the instrument and was subsisting in an operative form in his mind until time of his death, it would only be a case of mistaken conception of the legal significance of the terms of a contract that he had accepted. A mistake at law pure and simple is not adequate ground for relief.

Bibbs v. Lumley, 2 East, 469; 2 Pom. Eq. Jurisp. p. 304.

In such a case as this the right vests at once in the beneficiary upon the death of the assured, and the manner and time of payment and delay in the payment do not affect the interest so vesting.

Union Mut. Assn. of Battle Creek v. Montgomery, 14 West. Rep. 877, 70 Mich. 587; Nitzgerald v. Equitable Reserve Fund L. Assn. 18 N. Y. S. R. 914.

The death of Starling D. Rouse, and not the death of the wife, Ella H. Rouse, fixed the rights of the beneficiaries.

See United States Trust Co. v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 23 N. Y. S. R. 597, 24 N. Y. S. R. 1; Titusworth v. Titusworth, 40 Kan. 571; Darrou v. Family Fund Soc. 43 Hun. 245.

Upon the death of the member then the benefit certificate takes effect, so far as to vest in the beneficiary an absolute right to the benefit money.

Hayt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The amended answer admits, by failing to deny, the facts as stated in the complaint, and, for the purposes of this appeal, the new matter set up in this answer must also be taken as true. Upon these facts, the position of appellee is that upon the death of the insured the right to the fund vested absolutely in the wife, Ella A. Rouse, and that upon her death the right to the uncollected fund passed as part of her estate to her administrator, to be by him disposed of as other assets of the estate. The contention of appellant is that, as the fund had not been paid over or collected at the time of the death of the wife, the right thereto became vested in the children, under the terms of the policy. The certificate is, in legal contemplation, a policy of life insurance, and to be construed as such. That the amount can only be collected by assessment upon members of the association, after due notice of death, and the payment of such assessment is purely voluntary, can make no difference. The association, so far as it is engaged in the business of life insurance, must be treated in law as a mutual life insurance company. The certificate is to be regarded as a written contract, and, so far as it goes, it is the measure of the rights of all parties. Bolton v. Bolton, 78 Me. 299; Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 149; State v. Farmers

Turning to the policy executed in this case, we find the disposing clause to be couched in the following language: "Which sum shall, at his death, be paid to his wife, Ella A. Rouse, and, in case of her death, to Mary E., Clara D. and Anna L. Rouse, children." It would be difficult to find language to more clearly and definitely fix the time at which the right to this money vested in Ella A. Rouse than the words "at his death." It is claimed, however, that the words following, "in case of her death, to Mary E., Clara D. and Anna L. Rouse, children," qualify the words immediately preceding, and that, when construed together, they give to the children a right to the fund so long as the same is capable of practical identification and control, and has not been otherwise appropriated by the wife, although the wife in fact survives the husband. But the plain intent of the language of the policy is against such construction. The words, "which sum shall, at his death," fix the time at which the right to the fund is to be determined, and the words following provide for the payment to the children in case the wife shall not be living at that time. The children were only to receive the money upon the happening of certain contingencies. The risk taken by the association was upon the life of the assured. By his death the policy became fixed, and the right to the fund vested. The wife having survived the husband, her right became absolute by the express terms of the policy. This construction finds support, not alone in the language of the contract, but is also in accordance with the settled policy of the law, which is to favor vested, rather than contingent, estates; the first, rather than the second, taker. King v. Frick, 185 Pa. 575; Smith's App. 28 Pa. 9; Womrath v. McCormick, 51 Pa. 504; Felton v. Stuyver, 41 N. H. 203; 2 Redf. Wills, *253; Union Mut. Assn. of Battle Creek v. Montgomery, 70 Mich. 587, 14 West. Rep. 877.

A policy of life insurance is in the nature of a testament, and, although not a testament, in construing it the courts will so far as possible treat it as a will. Bolton v. Bolton, supra.

In King v. Frick, supra, an absolute devise was made by a father to his son, followed by a proviso to the effect that, in case the devisee should die without children, grandchildren or wife, living, the estate should go over. The words "die without children," etc., were held to refer to the death of the son in the lifetime of the testator, and the son, having survived the testator, was declared the owner of the fee.

The case of Union Mut. Assn. of Battle Creek v. Montgomery, supra, is in some respects quite analogous to the case at bar. It was provided by the certificate issued in that case that the insurance should be paid to the son and daughter of the insured equally, if living, and, if not living, to his heirs; in case of the death of either the son or daughter, the full amount was to be paid to the survivor; and the court held the provision as to survivorship related to the time of the death of the donor. And it appearing that both beneficiaries were living at that time, although one had died before the payment of the benefit, his executor was entitled to the share, and not the survivor. In the course of the opinion the court said: "The scheme of the corporation is to raise a fund which shall pass to designated beneficiaries at the death of a member. The right, which before was inchoate and contingent, becomes upon the death of the member fixed and certain in the beneficiaries. . . . The time of payment provided for, namely, ninety days after the death of the member, has no reference to who shall take as survivor." So, in the case at bar, we are of the opinion that, by the express terms of the policy, the right to the fund became vested in Ella A. Rouse upon the death of her husband. Consequently, upon her death, the fund should pass to the administrator as a part of her estate. There is nothing in the constitution or by-laws of the association, as pleaded, to change this result. Whatever rights, if any, may have been reserved to the society by these instruments, have been waived by it, and the fund deposited subject to the order of the court. While we feel that our conclusion as to the party entitled to the fund must necessarily follow as a matter of law, in answer to the argument of counsel based upon the duty of the deceased father to provide for his children, it may be said that it was equally his duty to provide for his invalid wife. She was the person having the strongest claim upon his estate and bounty. If the construction contended for by counsel be adopted, the wife could not use the fund, no matter to what extremity she may have been driven in the final sickness intervening between the death of her natural and legal protector and her own death. She could not, by anticipating the payment of the legacy, surround herself with the things that might have been absolutely necessary to sustain her life from day to day. In addition to this, it would place the beneficiary primarily entitled to the fund to a great extent within the power of the insurer. For instance, by withholding payment, the beneficiary would be compelled to bring suit for the money, the ultimate decision of which might be delayed for years; and if, during the time, the wife should die, others would receive the reward of her endeavors without sharing the expense. Under such circumstances, it is easily to be seen that the insurance corporation or association could compel the wife in many instances to accept less than the face of the policy, rather than institute a suit, no matter how clear her right of recovery might be.

Elliott, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the foregoing opinion. In the original investigation of this case the various questions involved in the record were carefully considered. By the reargument nothing essentially new has been presented. Hence I now feel constrained to refile the former unanimous opinion of this court as an expression of the reasons for my present dissent. The part relating to the construction of the certificate was as follows: "While the certificate is to be construed as a contract, nevertheless, it being in the nature of a policy of insurance,—a post mortem provision for the benefit of those dependent upon the assured for support,—it is, like the provisions of a will, to be liberally construed in favor of those who may naturally be presumed to have been the objects of their father's bounty. In order to correctly understand and give effect to the contract over which this controversy has arisen, certain rules for the interpretation and construction of written instruments will be noticed. Primarily to be considered is the intention of the husband and father in effecting the insurance, and this is to be ascertained from the language of the certificate itself, construing its words according to their common and reasonable signification, so as to give effect to the entire instrument as far as practicable; secondly, the language of the instrument is to be construed in the light of extrinsic circumstances attending its execution, considering the situation and relations in life of the several parties therein mentioned, and the objects and interests to be thereby secured. We are not unmindful of the rule which excludes the proof of contemporaneous oral language to vary the terms of valid written instruments. 2 Bl. Com. pp. 379-381; 1 Redf. Wills, pp. 421, 668; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 275-277; St. Louis & D. L. & Min. Co. v. Tierney, 5 Colo. 582; Ballou v. Gile, 50 Wis. 614; Clarke v. Johnston, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 502, 508, 21 L. ed. 906; McDermott v. Centennial Mut. L. Assn., 24 Mo. App. 73; Walker v. Douglas, 70 Ill. 445; St. Clair Co. Ben. Soc. v. Fietsam, 97 Ill. 474. What, then, was the intent of the assured in causing to be inserted in the certificate of insurance the provision that the money should, 'at his death be paid to his wife, Ella A. Rouse, and, in case of her death, to Mary E., Clara D. and Anna L. Rouse, children?' It is claimed by counsel for the administrator that by the terms of the certificate the right to the insurance money vested in Ella A. Rouse immediately upon the death of her husband. This claim is based upon the words of the certificate that the money shall 'at his death be paid to his wife, Ella.' But these are not the only words of the instrument relating to that subject. It also contains the words, 'case of her death'; that is, it is further provided that in case of the death of the wife, Ella, the money shall be paid to Mary, Clara and Anna, children of the assured. In argument, however, counsel have sought to maintain the administrator's claim by construing the certificate: First, as though the children were not named therein as beneficiaries; and, second, as though they were only entitled to the insurance in case the wife should die before the death of the assured. The argument is not well founded. It violates an elementary rule for the construction of contracts, in that it does not give effect to the whole language of the instrument. In the first instance it omits, and in the second adds, important words. The effect of the addition, as well as the omission, is to defeat the clearly expressed intention of the assured. It is true the certificate was framed so that the wife's right vested immediately upon her husband's death, but such right was not indefeasible. On the contrary, it was subject to be devested by her own death. The certificate expressly provides that, in case of the wife's death, the insurance shall be paid to the children; and thus provision was made for the vesting of the children's rights just as surely as for the vesting of her own. This last provision is in no way limited or qualified as to the time of her death; it is direct and unequivocal to the effect that, in case of the wife's death, either before or after the death of the assured, the money shall be paid to the children named in the certificate. The intention is clear that, in the event of the wife's death at any time while the insurance money should be unpaid, so as to be capable of practical identification and control, it should be paid to the children, thus giving them the greatest advantage that could arise from such a contingency, so long as the fund should not be otherwise appropriated by the wife. Thus effect is given to the entire certificate without doing violence to its obvious meaning or to any of its words; and thus a construction is reached in accordance with well-settled legal rules, as well as in harmony with the dictates of reason and humanity. The adjudicated cases cited in behalf of the administrator's claim do not necessarily militate against the foregoing construction. In the case of Richmond v. Johnson, 28 Minn. 447, the wife only was named as the beneficiary in the certificate. In the case of Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 84 Conn. 805, the policy was made payable to the children only in case the wife should die before her husband's death should occur; and in Chapin v. Pellones, 86 Conn. 182, the policy contained a similar provision. In each of the Connecticut cases the wife died before the husband. In the former case the wife had made an absolute assignment of her interest in the policy for a valuable consideration, but the children nevertheless were allowed to recover against the claim of the assignee. In the latter case the children were protected against the claims of the creditors of the husband. Thus it appears how jealously the rights of beneficiaries of such insurance, even in the second degree, are guarded by the courts. Our attention has not been called to any case where the provisions of the policy or certificate of insurance were identical, or so nearly analogous to the one under consideration as to affect our conclusion. It is always safer to be guided by legal principles, founded on justice and equity, than to attempt to follow case precedents based on facts or circumstances not strictly analogous or controlling. In this connection we quote the language of an eminent author upon the construction of instruments of this character: 'Precedents ought never to be allowed an arbitrary and unbending control of any case not precisely analogous; we might say, not strictly identical. And while all analogies, however remote, must be, and should be, allowed to have their just and proper weight, and the more weight in proportion to the nearness of the analogy, in determining future cases, we ought never to forget that mere analogies never rise above the character of assistants. We should not, therefore, allow ourselves to become slaves to them.' Again, after adverting to the fact that the English courts follow precedents in matters of this kind more strictly than do the American tribunals, the same author adds: 'But, at the same time, when cases occur, as will always be the fact in regard to the largest proportion, which have to be determined upon their peculiar circumstances, the English courts manifest no reluctance to grapple with the difficulties which present themselves, however formidable or embarrassing, and to place all cases upon their proper basis of truth and justice, without regard to the entire want of precedent to maintain them. . . . And the same tendency is observable in decisions of the American courts.' 1 Redf. Wills, p. 428. Reading the certificate in the light of the extrinsic circumstances as shown by the amended answer, and considering the condition of the assured and of the different members of his family, and the relations they sustained to each other at the time of effecting the insurance, no one can doubt for a moment that it was the father's intention that the insurance money should be paid to his infant daughters in case his invalid wife should die either before his own death should occur, or before the money should be paid to her. These children were his legitimate heirs, dependent upon him for support, and, next after his wife, the natural objects of his bounty. They were not the children of his wife, Ella, and could not inherit from her; hence we perceive his prudent foresight, as well as fatherly care, in causing their names to be inserted as beneficiaries in the certificate, contingent upon his wife's expected death. If anything further were needed to strengthen the construction we have given this instrument, the objects, purposes, rules and regulations of the benevolent order from which this certificate of insurance emanated might be considered. But it is scarcely necessary to invoke cumulative authority to confirm the view that it was the father's intention, in case of his wife's death, that the insurance money should go to his doubly orphaned minor children, instead of the administrator of the deceased wife, either for the payment of her debts, or for the benefit of her heirs, who were to him as strangers, having no special claim upon his fortune, his benevolence or the fruits of his labor." Henry v. Thomas, 118 Ind. 27.

In the opinion on the rehearing, the majority of the court place great reliance upon the case of Union Mut. Assn. of Battle Creek v. Montgomery, 70 Mich. 587. That case, to use the language of Judge Redfield, quoted in the former opinion, is neither "precisely analogous" nor "strictly identical" with the one now under consideration. In that case the certificate was for $1,500 upon the life of Edward C. Franklin, payable ninety days after satisfactory proof of his death, and the concluding clause was as follows: "The said union mutual association agrees to pay to his son and daughter, N. Lyon and Charlotte A. Franklin, equally,—in case of death of either, full amount to go to the survivor,—one thousand five hundred dollars, if living; if not living, to the heirs of said member." Both beneficiaries were living at the death of the assured. Satisfactory proofs of the death of the assured were made, and both beneficiaries claimed payment of their respective moieties; but before the money was paid one of the beneficiaries died leaving a will by which his interest in the certificate was disposed of. The court held that the words "if living" and "if not living" refer to living at the time of the assured's death; and that the share of each beneficiary vested absolutely at the death of the assured, for the reason that the policy of the Michigan statutes favors vested estates in preference to contingent, unless an intention appears to the contrary, and that the share of the deceased beneficiary could be disposed of by his last will.

It is unnecessary to question the correctness of the Michigan decision in construing the instrument before us. In that case it was necessary to construe the words "if living" and "if not living" with reference to some particular date or event connected with the vesting of the fund specified in the certificate. No such necessity exists in the case before us. The certificate does not contain the words "if living" or "if not living," or other equivalent words; but, as was said in the former opinion, the provision in regard to the children's interest "is in no way limited or qualified as to the time of the wife's death;" so that, whether the wife be living or not living at the death of the assured, the direct and unequivocal provision of the certificate is that, "in case of her death," the money shall be paid to the children named therein. It does not appear in the record before us that the wife, either by will or otherwise, ever attempted to dispose of the insurance money, or of her interest in the certificate. If she had needed the fund to provide for her necessities while living, and had actually disposed of or hypothecated it for that purpose, as indicated in the present opinion of the majority of the court, and such fact had been properly pleaded, perhaps the claim of the children might have been defeated in whole or in part for that reason. But it is vain to speculate as to matters not set forth in the record.

Much stress is laid upon the rule that the law favors vested estates in preference to contingent, unless an intention appears to the contrary. It will be noticed that the rule thus stated is pregnant with two very important and significant admissions: first, that contingent estates may be created; and, second, that the intention of the parties creating an estate is to be considered in determining its character. Let us test the certificate in the light of this rule. It cannot be denied that a contingent estate is contemplated by its express terms; indeed, a series of contingencies are contemplated. In the first place, the very object of procuring the certificate of insurance was to provide for the family of the assured in the contingency of his own death while they, or some of them, were living. The first contingency was that the insurance money should be paid to his wife. Thus far there is no dispute. It is also undisputed that in a certain contingency the insurance should be paid to his children. What was the latter contingency? It is plainly stated in the certificate to be the contingency of the wife's death,—no more, no less. There are no other words limiting or qualifying the latter contingency. First, then, the husband, anticipating his own death, procures the insurance for his wife's benefit. Second, knowing that his wife, according to the course of nature, must certainly die sometime, he provides that, in case of her death, the insurance shall be paid to his children. The wife being an invalid, and presumably older than his minor children, it is reasonable to presume the assured expected them to survive her death. In the light of such facts and circumstances, what intention is conveyed by the terms of the certificate? The entire operative words have been considered. Nothing has been added thereto or subtracted therefrom. Legitimate facts and circumstances only have been taken into consideration in construing the language of the written instrument. The reasonable legal inference to be drawn from such language, under the circumstances, is that the father intended the insurance should go to the invalid wife for her use while living, with remainder to his own children in the contingency of the wife's death whenever it should occur; and so he used the unlimited words, "in case of her death to be paid to the children," inasmuch as they could not inherit from their step-mother. Words might have been inserted in the certificate providing for the payment of the insurance to the children only in the contingency of the wife's death before the death of the assured. If such words had been inserted, they would necessarily have controlled the interpretation of the instrument. But such words were not inserted, and they certainly should not be supplied by implication, when, from all the facts and circumstances legitimate to be considered in construing the instrument, the obvious effect of supplying them, as contended by appellee, would be to defeat, not to effectuate, the intention of the assured.

In the many elaborate briefs and arguments of counsel for the administrator it is nowhere claimed that Starling D. Rouse could or did have any intention of making provision for strangers to the exclusion of any member of his own dependent family. But the contention is that a certain "formula of words" used in the certificate has been construed by the courts to have a certain and definite significance, and that this court should feel itself bound by such precedents. As heretofore shown, no case has been cited in which the language was "precisely analogous" or "strictly identical" with the certificate under consideration; nor has any case been cited where the circumstances and relation of the parties to be affected by the instrument were either precisely or substantially analogous to those under consideration. It has been before observed, and it can scarcely be made clearer by repetition, that the courts, especially the American courts, will not allow themselves to become slaves to "arbitrary and unbending" precedents, when the effect of such servility is to do manifest injustice. But they will rather "grapple with the difficulties which present themselves, however formidable and embarrassing," in each particular case, and determine the same with reference to its "peculiar circumstances," placing the decision "upon the proper basis of truth and justice, without regard to the entire want of precedent." 1 Redf. Wills, supra.

The law is not, and in the nature of things cannot be, an exact science, like mathematics. Long ago able jurists gave up the idea of formulating specific rules adapted to the exigencies of each particular case. At the best, the law is but a rational science, founded on general principles of right and justice. Experience has shown that these principles, when intelligently and conscientiously applied, insure substantial justice in the larger proportion of litigated controversies. In mere matters of procedure, which are but the means to the end, specific rules of comparative uniformity may be formulated, and many precedents may be thereby established, though, even in this branch of the law, much must necessarily be left to sound judicial discretion. But in the great field of jurisprudence, relating to rights of persons and rights of property, arbitrary and unbending precedents have ever been found too narrow for the multitude of vexatious and complicated controversies arising from the varied transactions of an enlightened and progressive people. Precedents are valuable aids to those who can utilize them with intelligent discrimination; but to those who are dependent upon such assistants, precedents are liable to become uncertain and misleading guides.

Petition for second rehearing overruled.

The rule of law in regard to the negligence of an adult and of an infant of tender years is different as to the measure and degree of care the omission of which would constitute contributory negligence, which is to be graduated by the age and capacity of the individual. *Washington & G. (March 9, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Montgomery County in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's son, which was alleged to have resulted from defendants' negligence. Reversed.

Defendants were owners and operators of woolen mills, in one of which was a hoisting apparatus consisting of machinery, pulleys, etc., inside the building and chain terminating in hooks on the outside where the hoisting was done. Above the hooks and fastened to the chain is an iron ball for the purpose of keeping the chain taut and perpendicular.

The deceased, a boy six or seven years old, attempted to ascertain how high he dared to permit the apparatus to carry him and was taken to the third story of the building, when he became frightened and unable longer to cling to the chain and fell to the ground and was killed.

The defendants requested inter alia instructions to the effect, (1) that the boy was a trespasser and plaintiff could not recover, and (8) that the verdict must be for defendants, both of which were refused.

Beed, 4 Allen, 431. See Meibus v. Dodge, 36 Wis. 300.

In an action brought by an infant, as a general rule the same defense may be interposed as in case of an adult plaintiff; so it has been held that in an action for personal injuries by negligence contributory negligence may be shown in defense. Hartfield v. Roper, 21 Wend. 615; Honegsberger v. Second Ave. R. Co. 33 How. Pr. 193.

But this rule will hardly be applied against an infant of such tender age as to be incapable of self-control and personal protection to the same extent as to an adult. *Mangan v. Brooklyn R. It has been held in Pennsylvania that parents who permit their children to trespass upon the property of a railroad company are guilty of negligence, and that when a child of tender age is allowed so to do the company owes it no duty and is not liable to either party for the injury. A distinction is made between the case of a boy who uses the highway solely for the purpose of playing and who meets with an injury from a defect in the highway. Bodgett v. Boston, 8 Allen, 237; Tighe v. Lowell, 119 Mass. 472; Gulline v. Lowell, 4 New Eng. Messrs. N. H. Larzelere and M. M. Gibson, for appellee:

A child injured while trespassing has no right of action, unless injured by the negligence of defendants, when the injury might have been avoided by ordinary care on defendants' part. But when a child of tender years commits a mere technical trespass, and is injured by agencies that to an adult would be open and obvious warnings of danger, but not so to a child, he is not barred from recovering, if the things instrumental in his injury were left exposed and unguarded, and were of such a character as to be likely to attract children, excite their curiosity and lead to their injury, while they were pursuing their childish instincts.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If the chain and ball at the defendants' mill had been running regularly in the actual business of raising or lowering grain or flour, and the plaintiff's son had jumped upon the ball to ride up in the air, and fallen, it certainly could not be held that the defendants would be liable for the consequences. They would have been in the lawful prosecution of their business, with an apparatus proper for such uses, and owing no duty of protection to passing children against the consequences of their reckless acts in rushing into so manifest a danger. So if a boy of tender years attempts to climb upon a train of cars while in active movement, regardless of the dangerous results likely to ensue, and is injured, he certainly cannot recover damages from the company upon the theory that he cannot be guilty of contributory negligence. If in the present case the chain and ball had not been in motion, but were at rest, and the boy had jumped upon the ball precisely as he did, and his act had set the chain to running, and started the ball upward, there would be plausibility in the argument for a recovery that the boy was ignorant of the effect of his act. The case then would, perhaps, have come within the decision of this court in the case of Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, 83 Pa. 383. That decision was put expressly upon the ground that there was nothing to indicate the dangerous character of the platform, which was so placed that it was liable at any moment to fall and crush children beneath it like mice in a dead-fall.

In the case of Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144, we said that case "was decided upon its own peculiar circumstances," and we also said "it was not intended to assert the doctrine that a child cannot be treated as a trespasser or wrong-doer, and so far as it appears to sanction such a doctrine it must be considered as overruled." We also said: "Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, is authority only for its own facts." We further said: "It is settled by abundant authority that, to enable a trespasser to recover for an injury, he must do more than show negligence. It must appear that there was a wanton or intentional injury inflicted on him by the owner." That a child of tender years may be a trespasser, and be subject to the consequences of his trespass, has been decided by this court so many times, and in so many varying circumstances, that the question is no longer open to discussion. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hummel, 44 Pa. 375; Flower v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 69 Pa. 210; Duff v. Allegheny Valley R. Co. 91 Pa. 458; *Cauley v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. 5 Cent. Rep. 324; McMullen v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 193 Pa. 107.

In Cauley v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co., 98 Pa. 498, we held that where a boy seven years old, who was playing upon a sand-car, was ordered off the car by the conductor while the car was moving slowly, and who, in getting off, was injured, there could be no recovery. When the case was first heard in this court (reported in 95 Pa. 898) we said: "In regard to the suit brought for the child by his father as his next friend it is sufficient to say that, the child being unlawfully upon the car, the defendant company owed it no duty, and is not liable for the injury."

In Hestonville Pass. R. Co. v. Connell, 88 Pa. 520, where a child six years and nine months old was injured in attempting to get on the front platform of a car while in motion, we held there could be no recovery. Mr. Justice Gordon, in delivering the opinion, said: "Nevertheless it may be assumed that a child old enough to be trusted to run at large has wit enough to avoid ordinary danger, and so persons who have business on the streets may reasonably conclude that such a one will not voluntarily thrust itself under the feet of his horses, or under the wheels of his carriage; a fortiori may they conclude that they are not to provide against possible damages that may result to the infant from its own willful trespass."

In the case of Moore v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 99 Pa. 301, a boy of ten years was walking along the track on the sleepers, and was run over by a passing train and killed. We held there could be no recovery because he was a trespasser. We said: "The circumstance that the trespasser in this instance was a boy ten years of age cannot affect the application of the rule. The defendant owed him no greater duty than if he had been an adult. They are not subject to an obligation to take precautions against any class of persons who may walk on and along their tracks."

In Oil City & Petroleum Bridge Co. v. Jackson, 114 Pa. 331, a boy of seven years, while crossing upon defendant's bridge, got upon a gas-pipe, five inches in diameter, at a place where there was an opening in the floor, and while walking on the pipe fell into the river below and was drowned. We held there could be no recovery. Mr. Justice Paxson, delivering the opinion, said: "The child who was killed was not using it [the bridge] in the ordinary way. He was walking upon the gas-pipe, where he ought not to have been, and which was so dangerous that his younger brother remonstrated with him, and warned him to get off. It is not necessary to impute negligence to the child; it is sufficient that he was injured, not as the result of the use of the bridge, but as the consequence of his venturing in his childish recklessness where no one, child or adult, had any business to be."

These principles are precisely applicable to the present case. The chain and ball were not at rest; they were in actual motion, and the boy, fully knowing that, and intending to do exactly what he did do, jumped upon the ball for the very purpose of riding upward on it. The boy who was with him, and who testified for the plaintiff, said: "The ball was down. When both of us met he said: 'Hello, Kinnin-'

I bet I can go up higher on the ball than you." I told him he had better not, he would fall. I did not hear him say anything then. He got on the ball, and sat on the ball and held the chain. Then when he was going up he tried to get down. He got down from the ball, and the hook caught him,—I think that the hook caught him,—and then when he was going up higher the hook gave way when he was going up. Then he hung with his hands on the ball. Then Tom McCormick came out of the door of the mill, and when he saw the boy going up he ran to leave the ball down. Then the boy fell before he had time." It is thus fully proved by the plaintiff, and not contradicted, that the boy got upon the ball for the express purpose of riding up on it, and notwithstanding his companion warned him not to do it, saying he might fall. His death was caused solely by his own rash and reckless act while in a place where he had not the least right to be. Of course he was a trespasser, in every sense of the word. The ball and chain were not used for any purpose of conveying persons up or down, and the case is therefore stronger than either Cauley v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. or Hestonville Pass. R. Co. v. Connell. We can see no reason why the principle of those cases is not strictly applicable to this, only in a greater degree. And the doctrine of Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Schwindling, Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hummel and Oil City & Petroleum Bridge Co. v. Jackson,—that the boy was in a place where he had no right to be, and where he was not entitled to any protection from the defendants against his own reckless trespass,—is, if anything, still more applicable. In the Bridge Case the boy had a right to be on the bridge for the purpose of crossing it, and in the Schwindling Case the boy was not necessarily a trespasser by being on the platform; but here the trespass was absolute, and very gross. There was no right or justification or excuse of any kind for the presence of the boy, or of any other person, on the ball for any purpose whatever, much less for the purpose of riding on it. In point of fact, the ball and chain had been in use for hoisting up material until almost the moment of the accident. One of the men was still in the mill. A number of the defendants' hands testified that the ball was stopped, and hung up out of reach, but in some way they could not account for it had got in motion again, showing that the ball was not carelessly left dangling and in a condition to move. In this momentary interval it happened that the plaintiff's son came along and jumped upon it. Upon the whole case we think the defendants' first and second points should have been affirmed.

 Thomas ASH.

A reservation of ground rent in "Spanish milled silver dollars"

without specifying their weight or fineness at a time when they were legal tender by Act of Congress is presumed to be for the benefit of the owner of the rent, and a tender of such dollars for the rent is good even after Congress has demonetized them and Spain has ceased to coin them and provided for their withdrawal, substituting a new coinage, the use of which is obligatory.

(April 27, 1891.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for Philadelphia County in favor of defendant upon a case stated for the opinion of the court the object of which was to determine the sufficiency of a tender of ground rent. Affirmed.

This is an action to test the sufficiency of a tender of Spanish milled dollars in payment of arrears of ground rent due in September, 1890, on premises in Philadelphia.

The most important parts of the case stated are as follows: In 1792 Congress adopted the Spanish milled silver dollar as the standard of value of the United States dollar authorized to be coined by that Act. In 1806 Congress made Spanish milled silver dollars (of 17 pwts. 7 grs. in weight) a legal tender for all debts at the rate of one hundred cents of United States currency; and they so continued until demonetized in 1857. In 1806, at which time Spanish milled dollars were a legal tender and a part of the money current in the United States, the ground rent in question was reserved in "Spanish milled silver dollars and two thirds of a dollar" without specifying their weight or fineness; and in other parts of the ground-rent deed the word "dollars" was used without specifying the kind of dollars referred to. In 1857 Congress demonetized Spanish milled silver dollars. In 1868 Spain adopted the currency of the Latin Union in which the dollar had no place, made the new coinage obligatory and provided for the withdrawal of the old currency. In 1890 quarterly payments of the ground rent fell due and payment thereof was tendered in Spanish milled dollars and United States cents, which tender was refused.

Messrs. Samuel Hinds, Thomas & Henry Pleasants, for appellants:

No weight or fineness is specified for the coins, and the word "dollars," without further designation, is used throughout the deed, except in the reservation clause. These features distinguish the case at bar from Mather v. Kintke, 51 Pa. 425; Christ Church Hospital v. Fueschel, 54 Pa. 78; Perot v. Eichholz, 35 W. N. C. 527, and Dutton v. Pailaret, 52 Pa. 109.

If the court should be of the opinion that the tender of the forty-one Spanish milled silver dollars and one cent was a sufficient tender, then judgment was to be entered in favor of the defendant; otherwise judgment was to be entered in favor of plaintiffs for $41.01 lawful money of the United States of America, with costs.

Judgment was entered by the court in favor of the defendant upon the case stated.

The absence of designated weight for the dollars reserved in the case at bar indicates that the reservation was intended simply as a reservation of such Spanish dollars as were lawful money; and "contracts for lawful money" are contracts for the payment of the legal tender of the country.

Butler v. Horvitz, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 261, 19 L. ed. 150; Mather v. Kinike, 51 Pa. 429.

The legal tender Spanish dollar was intended to be reserved in this deed.

Dutton v. Pailaret, 52 Pa. 112.

The fact that coins were stipulated for becomes in this case an important consideration, as evidencing that the reservation was not of a mere commodity, since in this case the dollars reserved were "coins that our land recognizes as money."

Mather v. Kinike, 51 Pa. 429.

The Spanish milled dollars contemplated in the reservation clause in this deed were such Spanish milled dollars as were a legal tender under the Act of Congress of 1806, and the reservation is not for a specific article or a mere commodity, but for lawful money; and as these Spanish dollars were demonetized in 1857, the rent reserved could no longer be paid in such dollars, but must be paid in such legal tenders as the government provides and sanctions when the time for payment arrives.

Knox v. Lee, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 487, 20 L. ed. 806; Perot v. Eichholz, 25 W. N. C. 525; Mauls v. Stokes, 3 W. N. C. 878; Morris v. Bancroft, 9 Phila. 277.

In every reported case where the contract has been held to be for a specific article and not for lawful money legal tenders are "expressly excluded" by the terms of the contract "unless they should happen to correspond with the standard adopted by the parties as a law unto themselves."

Dutton v. Pailaret, 52 Pa. 112.

A tender of demonetized or obsolete coin is no more a payment of the debt contracted than would a present tender of notes of the late Confederate States be payment of a contract lawfully made in the insurgent States during the civil war. Under such circumstances the rule has been clearly enunciated by the Supreme Court of the United States that the value of the demonetized or obsolete currency is to be estimated "in lawful money of the United States at the time when and place where such contracts were made."

Effinger v. Kenney, 115 U. S. 566, 29 L. ed. 495.

Mr. Joseph M. Pile for appellee.

Per Curiam:

The court below properly held that the plaintiff was obliged to receive the kind of money his contract called for. It is to be presumed that when the ground rent was created the reservation of the rent in "Spanish milled silver dollars" was for the benefit of the owner of the rent. It was certainly not for the benefit of the ground tenant. The plaintiff, having enjoyed what benefit there was under the contract, may well take the disadvantages thereof, if there are any.

Judgment affirmed.

PHILADELPHIA & ERIE R. CO., Appt.

(...Pa....)

A railroad is located so as to exclude the appropriation of the land selected by third persons for other uses when a definite location has been adopted by the action of the company, but the act of an engineer in staking out the line is not a sufficient location.

(April 6, 1881.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Lycoming County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enjoin defendant from locating its railroad upon land alleged to have been previously appropriated by plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Henry C. Parsons and Wayne MacVeagh, for appellant:

The location of a railroad is the act of the corporation and must be with the bona fide intention of building the road.

Pittsburgh, V. & O. R. Co. v. Com. 101 Pa. 196.

The location of the road is the actual taking of the land for the purpose of a railroad, and not a mere survey.

Neal v. Pittsburgh & O. R. Co. 2 Grant, Cas. 188.

NOTE.—Location of railroad; what sufficient to exclude appropriation of land by rival road.

The question what constitutes an appropriation by a railroad company of particular land for use as a right of way which will exclude other companies from occupying the same land does not appear to have received much attention by the courts. The doctrine stated in Contra Costa Coal Mines R. Co. v. Moss, 23 Cal. 380, that priority of location and appropriation gives priority of right, is not questioned in the absence of statutes which either directly or by implication give one of the claimants the better right. See Barre R. Co. v. Montpelier & W. River R. Co. 4 L. R. A. 785, and note, 61 Vt. 1.

If such statutes exist they of course control the matter. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 4 Gill & J. 1.

The question seems to have been more frequently passed upon in Pennsylvania than elsewhere, but as the principal case settles the law there and many of the expressions of opinion by judges of that State are obiter they will not be noticed.

Morris & E. R. Co. v. Blair, 9 N. J. Eq. 645, holds that mere experimental surveying of a route will not confer any vested or legal right until it shall have been adopted, and that the company which first adopted a route and first filed its survey in the office of the secretary of state had the better right.

In Sioux City & D. M. R. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 27 Fed. Rep. 770, defendant set forth its claim to the land in controversy by stating that in the summer of 1881 it caused surveys to be made for such line, and in the fall of 1881 it located the same; that in June, 1885, it retraced its located line and permanently located it, marking it with stakes driven in the center line, and alleged that it was

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The important question presented by this appeal is, What constitutes a valid location on the ground of a projected line of railroad? It is singular that such a question should be to any extent an open one in a State remarkable, as Pennsylvania is, for the number and extent of its railroads. The act of location is an appropriation of private property by virtue of the right of eminent domain with which the State has invested the railroad company, either by the Act of incorporation or by virtue of general laws.

The requisites of a valid location may be considered, first, with reference to the private owners upon or over whose lands the location is made, and next, with reference to third parties and other corporations.

The successive steps contemplated by the Act of 1849 and subsequent legislation as necessary to vest a title to the roadway in the corporation are these:

First. A preliminary entry on the lands of private owners for the purpose of exploration.

This is made by engineers and surveyors who run and mark one or more experimental lines, and who report their work with such maps and profiles as may be necessary to present it properly to the company that employs them.

Second. A selection and adoption of a line, or one of the lines so run, as and for the location of the proposed railroad. This is done by the corporation and it requires the action in some form of the board of directors. This makes what was before experimental and open a fixed and definite location. It fastens a servitude upon the property affected thereby and so takes from the owner and appropriates to the use of the corporation.

Third. Payment to the owner for what is taken and the consequences of the taking, or security that it shall be made, when the amount due him is legally ascertained.

The title of the owner is not divested until the last of these steps has been taken. Levering v. Philadelphia, G. & N. R. Co. 8 Watts & S. 450; McClinton v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. 66 Pa. 404; Dimmick v. Brodhead, 75 Pa. 464; Buffalo, N. Y. & Phila. R. Co. v. Harvey, 107 Pa. 819; Gilmore v. Pittsburgh, V. & C. R. Co. 104 Pa. 275.

As against him the corporation can acquire only a conditional title by its act of location, which ripens into an absolute one upon making compensation. As to third persons and rival corporations, however, the action of the company adopting a definite location is enough to give title. For this reason in several of the United States provision is made by law for recording the action of the company and the line adopted by it, so as to give notice to the public, and to settle questions of priority of title. We permanently located in June, 1885. Complainant claimed to have located its line in October, 1885, and alleged that on the 17th of the preceding August it had purchased the land in controversy. The court held that at that time defendant's line was permanently located and marked on the tract, and that defendant had the better right to construct its road over the same.

In Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Alling, 99 U. S. 463, 25 L. ed. 483, it was held that surveying and staking a route is not a sufficient location and appropriation of it to exclude the subsequent appropriation of part of it by a rival company, unless the survey was followed by actual occupation and use for railroad purposes. But in that case occupation for the purpose of construction in 1878 of a route surveyed in 1871 and 1872, the actual occupation being prior to that of the rival company and early enough to satisfy the requirements of the claimant's charter, was held sufficient to establish the claimant's title to the route.

Where two street railway companies were each granted the right to extend its track through a certain street to reach a ferry, the company which first actually took a qualified possession of the middle of the street by locating and constructing its extension therein until interfered with by the other company was held to have acquired the right to finish and operate its road as thus located free from interference by the other company. Waterbury v. Dry Dock, R. R. & B. R. Co. 54 Barb. 408.

The question as to what is a sufficient appropriation as against a rival company is frequently made to depend on the construction of state statutes; thus in Barre R. Co. v. Montpelier & W. River R. Co., 4 L. R. A. 788, 61 Vt. 1, the statute provided that before a company commences proceedings for the 12 L. R. A.

purpose of acquiring title to real estate or an interest therein it shall cause the location of its road signed by a majority of its directors, defining the courses, distances and boundaries of the same . . . to be recorded in the respective town clerks' offices of the towns through which it passes; and the court held that when such location had been signed and filed the company acquired the right to the location as against subsequent purchases or locations. The court intimated, however, that this right might be lost by a neglect to follow up the first steps with proper diligence.

The New York Statute provides that before constructing any part of its road the company must make and file a map and profile of the route intended to be adopted and give written notice to all occupants of the land affected, of the time and place of filing and that the route designated passes over the land of such occupants. In Hochester, H. & L. R. Co. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 110 N. Y. 128, the court held that compliance with those requirements fixed the company's right to the route as against other companies, and in New York & A. R. Co. v. New York, W. S. & B. R. Co., 11 Abb. N. C. 386, it was decided that merely filing the map was not sufficient.

Where two rival companies have each received permission to construct a railway system in the streets of a city the one which first begins work on a line involving a certain street in good faith and acting within the terms of its grant has the better right to the use of that portion of the street which its tracks will cover, and this right will continue so long as money is expended and work diligently prosecuted with a view to its completion. Indianapolis Cable Street R. Co. v. Citizens Street R. Co. (Ind.) 8 L. R. A. 589.

have no such statute and the action of the company must be proved by other competent evidence. Heiss v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 63 Pa. 72. But when proved it has the same effect upon all interested as though it had been recorded. It settles the date of actual appropriation, and shows the exact location of the line of the road proposed. An examination of our own case will show that the conclusions we have reached are fairly deducible from them. In New York & E. R. Co. v. Young, 33 Pa. 175, it was held that the location of the line of its road is intrusted by the law to the company alone; and after it has exercised the discretionary power confided to it its action is final as to third persons and cannot be reviewed. The same doctrine was again asserted in Cleveland & P. R. Co. v. Spear, 56 Pa. 325, and it has been adopted in many subsequent cases. The effect of a location when made so far as the line and the ground covered by it are concerned was considered in Pittsburgh, V. & O. R. Co. v. Com., 101 Pa. 192, and it was held the act of the company in adopting a definite and permanent location for its road was an appropriation of the ground covered by it whether such ground was within the inclosure of a private owner or in the public highway; in other words, this is the method by which the corporation exercises the power of eminent domain with which the State invested it at its creation, and takes what before belonged to others for its corporate use. It may acquire land by purchase, if its charter authorizes it to do so, before a location of its road; but if it does so it holds the land as any other purchaser would, subject to the right of anyone having the right to do so, to enter and appropriate it by virtue of the right of eminent domain. That a corporation cannot exercise the power to appropriate land until it has located its line is well settled. Thus, if a company has an option between two or more lines or routes it must make its election by an actual adoption of one of them before it can acquire title by appropriation upon either. 1 Redfield, Railways, 240. The reason for this is that the act of location is at the same time the act of appropriation. The space covered by the line as located is thereby seized and appropriated to the purposes of the construction and operation of the railroad by virtue of the power of eminent domain, and nothing remains to be done except to compensate the owner. After the act of location by the company, the owner or the company may proceed at once to secure an ascertainment of damages. Until such act neither can do so, for no right to damages vests in, or accrues to, the owner until there has been an appropriation of his property by the corporation. Davis v. Titusville & Oil City R. Co. 114 Pa. 308, 5 Cent. Rep. 908.

There should be no unnecessary delay in completing the preliminary exploration and making a location, if priority is to be secured. In New Brighton & N. C. R. Co's App., 105 Pa. 18, private parties in contemplation of securing a charter caused a preliminary survey to be made over a route for a railroad projected by them. They afterwards secured a charter and the corporation adopted the line of the preliminary survey as the location of its road. In the meantime another corporation had made a preliminary survey over the same ground and made a final location of its road. It was held that the latter company had the better title, and that the adoption by the former company of the line run before its incorporation could not carry its title back to the date of the preliminary survey.

The application of the rule now laid down as to what constitutes a valid location to the case before us disposes of this appeal. The plaintiff Company has the right under its charter and subsequent legislation to build its road from its present terminus at Halls to Williamsport and connect with the Philadelphia & Erie Railroad.

In 1886, and again, a year or more before the bill was filed in this case, the engineer of the plaintiff ran over a route from Halls to Williamsport connecting with the road of the Philadelphia & Erie Company, near the lot described in the bill as the Metzgar lot and set stakes along it. It does not appear in the bill or in the evidence that this preliminary survey was ever reported to the plaintiff Company or that any action was ever taken by the Company to fix the location of its road between Halls and the intersection with the Philadelphia & Erie in Williamsport.

In the meantime the latter Company in locating a branch of its road had run and adopted a line crossing one corner of the Metzgar lot over which the plaintiff claimed to have made a location by the act of its engineer, and was proceeding to have an assessment of the damages made in the manner provided by law when this bill was filed and an injunction obtained in the court below restraining the defendant from proceeding further in its effort to perfect its title to the location made for its branch over the Metzgar lot. The answer denied the plaintiff's title in these words: "The defendant denies that the said plaintiff ever made a valid and legal location of the line of its railroad upon the lot of the said John Metzgar." The plaintiff was thus called upon to show the fact of the location of its road upon the land or upon some part of the land which the defendant claimed the right to occupy under its location of its branch. It did not show or make any effort to show the location of the line of its road. When this want of title in the plaintiff was urged upon the attention of the learned judge of the court below he seemed to recognize its importance as a general proposition, but to think that it was rendered of no consequence in this case by the state of the pleadings. He said: "It is urged by the defendant that there is no evidence that the directors of the plaintiff ever authorized the location of this road. It might be sufficient answer to this allegation to say that there was no such issue raised by the pleadings." But we have seen that it was distinctly raised. The learned master found that the plaintiff's road had been located by an engineer. He did not find that the Company had ever taken any action whatever either before or after the engineer ran over the route. He could not from the evidence. An engineer may make explorations in advance of a location, or he may re-mark the line or adjust the grades after the adoption of a location, but an engineer alone cannot locate a railroad so as to give title to the company that employs him. He is not the company. The right of eminent domain does not reside in him.

Until the plaintiff was able to show that it had acquired title to the Metzgar lot or some portion of it by the location of its road upon it, it had no standing ground in a court of equity from which to ask an injunction in this case, and it should not have been granted. It sought to restrain the defendant from making an entry on the Metzgar lot because that lot had been already appropriated by itself to its own corporate uses. The fact on which its right to be heard rested was clearly and flatly denied by the defendant. No effort was made to show it, and without it the plaintiff was without a foundation on which his prayer for an injunction could rest.

APPEAL OF THIRD NATIONAL BANK of Philadelphia et al.

Re Distribution of Assets of VAN HAAGEN SOAP MANUFACTURING CO.

(....Pa....)

A loan of money to a corporation will render it liable for the debt although the note of individuals, instead of the note of the corporation, was taken therefor because it was supposed to be better security. The test is, whether the note was received as a consideration for the money or only as a security.

NOTE.—The one receiving credit, the one responsible for the debt.

The doctrine seems to be universal that the one to whom and upon whose credit money is loaned or property advanced is liable for the debt regardless of the fact that his name may not appear on the security taken, if such security is regarded by the parties purely as collateral. Thus, if a sale is made to and upon the credit of a partnership concern, the concern will be liable for the debt although the individual paper of one of the partners was taken as collateral security. See Emly v. Lye, 15 Best, 7; Siffkin v. Walker, 2 Campb. 308; Burns v. Pariah, 3 B. Mon. 8; Cunningham v. Smithson, 12 Leigh, 32; Beebe v. Rogers, 3 G. Greene, 519; Spaulding v. Ludlow Woolen Mills, 26 Vt. 150.

Likewise money borrowed by one partner and secured by his individual note is not a partnership debt although afterwards put into the business of the firm. Pritchett v. Pollock, 82 Ala. 189; Graeff v. Hitchman, 5 Watts, 454 (citing Bevan v. Lewis, 1 Sim. 376; Stokes v. Whitaker, 1 Sim. 370; Maclink v. Crutcher, 6 Bush, 403; Willis v. Hill, 2 Dev. & B. L. 281).

When a member of a partnership borrows money on his own account the partnership is not liable for it although the lender is given to understand that it is to be used in the partnership business. Ah Lep v. Gong Choy, 18 Or. 205.

The prima facie liability of partners for a debt contracted by one partner may be rebutted by evidence that credit was given to the individual partner alone. Tyler v. Waddingham, 8 L. R. A. 557, 58 Conn. 375.

So in the case of credit obtained by an agent, if it was given to him alone the principal cannot be held liable, but if given to the principal, he must pay the debt, although the agent's paper is taken as collateral. See Pentz v. Stanton, 10 Wend. 271.

So the indorsee of a dishonored check, who has used it, is liable for money borrowed to pay the 12 L. R. A.

A PPEAL by certain creditors of the Van Haagen Soap Manufacturing Company from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 1, for Philadelphia County sustaining exceptions taken by the National Security Bank of Philadelphia and William H. Lambert to the report of the auditor appointed to distribute the assets in the hands of the assignee of such Company which disallowed a claim made by the exceptants to share in such assets, and recognizing their claims. Affirmed.

The receipt of a note or check, either of the debtor or a third party, for a debt, does not check if the loan was made to him as the debtor. Bailey v. Hurlbut, 40 Fed. Rep. 414.

The person to be held liable seems to be purely a matter of agreement (Partee v. Bedford, 51 Miss. 84); consequently if money is loaned or goods delivered to one with the understanding that the note of another should be taken as payment no recovery can be had by the creditor against the one receiving the money or goods. Bonnell v. Chamberlin, 26 Conn. 487.

To whom the credit was actually given is a question for the jury depending upon the intent, understanding and agreement of the parties. Smith v. Collins, 115 Mass. 388 (citing Taylor v. Wilson, 11 Met. 44; Allen v. Coit, 6 Hill, 518; Thompson v. Percival, 5 Barn. & Ad. 225; Pentz v. Stanton, 10 Wend. 277 (citing Bentley v. Griffin, 5 Taunt. 356; Leggat v. Reed, 1 Car. & P. 16).

It would seem that to be bound by his election the creditor must act with a full knowledge of the facts, as is evidenced by the familiar example of the creditor's seeking payment from the principal, for whose benefit the contract was made, but who was not disclosed at the time by the agent.

Effect of taking security as influenced by kind taken and time of taking.

The form of the security taken does not in general preclude the creditor from showing to whom the credit was actually given. Allen v. Coit, 6 Hill, 518 (citing Denton v. Rodie, 3 Campb. 493; Ex parte Bolitho, Buck, 100; Bank of South Carolina v. Case, 8 Barn. & C. 427; Duvall v. Wood, 3 Lane. 491).

If the jury or the court should find as a fact that the money was borrowed by and loaned to the firm and upon its credit, then the taking of the individual note of one member of the firm would not be a payment of the firm debt, unless it was affirmatively shown that such note was taken in payment of the same. Hoefflinger v. Wells, 47 Wis. 631 (citing Sheehy v. Mandeville, 10 U. S. 6 Cranoh, 263, 3 L. ed.

operate as payment or satisfaction unless expressly so agreed. In case the note or check is disallowed the original indebtedness revives.

Ash*, 7 Serg. & R. 116; Stone v. Miller, 16 Pa. 450.

Even a higher security for a debt given by different parties or for a different sum, in the absence of proof of the intention of the parties, is presumed to have been accepted as collateral security, and not in satisfaction of the debt.

Jones v. Johnson, 8 Watts & S. 376; Eby v. Eby, 5 Pa. 440; Eby v. Hoopes, 1 Pennyp. 176.

Some cases have recognized an exception to this rule when the note of a third party is taken for a contemporaneous debt, holding that a presumption arises that the note was taken in payment of the debt, and that the debt was merged into the note. This, however, is only a presumption. It may be rebutted by showing the actual intention of the parties to have been otherwise; in other words, by showing that it was intended that the primary debt should remain, and that the note was only given as an additional security for the same.

Rew v. Barber, 3 Cow. 279; Torry v. Hadley, 27 Barb. 196; Gordon v. Price, 10 Ired. L. 383; Youngs v. Stahelin, 34 N. Y. 258, 265; Bond v. Atkin, 6 Watts & S. 165, 166; Bayard v. Shunk, 1 Watts & S. 92, 95.

Many cases, however, are to the effect that no such distinction as to the presumption of payment exists.

Johnson v. Weed, 9 Johns. 310; Bartsch v. Atwater, 1 Conn. 409; Porter v. Talcott, 1 Cow. 359, 383; Monros v. Hoff, 5 Denio, 363; Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1543; Parsons, Bills and Notes, § 337.

In order that the supposed exception may apply the note must be that of a third party, and the acknowledged and known agent of the principal debtor is not such a third party.

Jett*, 42 Wis. 488).

There is some tendency in the authorities, however, to make an exception to the rule in the case of the taking of a bond from one partner. In such cases it has been held that the one giving the bond was alone liable for the debt which it was given to secure, and some have even held that it could not be afterwards shown that the credit was given to the firm. Thus it was held in Tom v. Goodrich, 3 Johns. 221, that the surety upon a bond given by one partner to the United States for duties on goods imported by the firm, could not look to the firm for reimbursement in case he was compelled to pay the debt; that he could look only to his principal. And in United States v. Astley, 3 Wash. C. O. 513, a recovery by the obligee against the firm was refused where one partner had given his bond for the duties. The reasoning of that case is, however, quite technical. It attempts to distinguish United States v. Lyman, 1 Mason, 422, in which Tom v. Goodrich is doubted, upon the ground that in United States v. Lyman the bond was that of a third person and unquestionably no more than collateral security, thereby implying that the bond of a partner could not be taken as collateral for the debt of the firm. Tom v. Goodrich was followed in Krafts v. Creighton, 3 Rich. L. 273.

And in Moore v. Stevens, 60 Miss. 803, one partner became a surety on a forthcoming bond for the benefit of the firm, and it was held that the firm was not liable to meet the obligation thereby incurred, placing its ruling upon the ground that the giving of such bond was not within the objects of the partnership; but there is an implication that had the transaction been within such objects a liability might have been incurred.

On the contrary, in Weaver v. Tapscott, 9 Leigh. 424, where one partner gave a bond for the hire of a slave used by the partnership and the surety thereon was compelled to pay it, he was held entitled to recover the amount from the firm.

The Pennsylvania doctrine seems to be that if the bond of one partner is given at the time of the loan as a consideration therefor it must be presumed to be the individual debt of the obligor unless there is positive evidence showing an agreement to the contrary. Bond v. Atkin, 6 Watts & S. 166; North Penna. Coal Co's App. 45 Pa. 181.

There is now no dissent from the position that as to pre-existing debts there is no presumption that the giving to the creditor of the note of a third person was intended as payment. See Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1536; Stevens v. Anderson, 30 Ind. 391; Kephardt v. Butcher, 17 Iowa, 240; Am. notes to Cumber v. Wane, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 148.

The exception as to contemporaneous debts mentioned in the appellee's brief in the principal case appears to exist. See Stephens v. Thompson, 23 Vt. 77.

But, as stated in the brief, if there is such exception it can amount to no more than a presumption that the obligor on the paper is the true debtor; and the distinction was practically ignored in Porter v. Talcott, 1 Cow. 383; Sutherland, J., saying that the taking of the note of a third person at the time of making the contract is not payment unless there is an agreement that it shall be, and citing Clerk v. Mundall, 12 Mod. 206; Ward v. Evans, 2 Ld. Raym. 390; Onwenson v. Morse, 7 T. R. 64; Johnson v. Weed, 9 Johns. 310; Whitbeck v. Van Ness, 11 Johns. 409.

the Common Pleas, No. 1, of Philadelphia. At the hearing before the auditor, the National Security Bank of Philadelphia presented a claim for $5,000, the amount of a loan alleged to have been made to the Company in June, 1885, for which the Bank, at the time of the loan, took the note of Anthony Van Haagen, payable to the order of John Hunter, and by him indorsed. William H. Lambert also presented a claim of $5,000, a loan alleged to have been made on the 15th of May, 1885, for which he took the note of John Hunter. Both of these notes were from time to time renewed until February, 1887, the interest thereon being paid by John Hunter. Both claims were objected to, on the ground that they were loans, not to the Van Haagen Soap Company, but to Anthony Van Haagen and John Hunter respectively, and that there was no liability on the part of the Soap Company to pay them.

The appellants' contention, however, is that the respective loans were in fact negotiated for and in behalf of the Company, and although the notes of Van Haagen and Hunter were, for supposed prudential reasons, taken as a security for payment thereof, the Company actually incurred the debt and is liable therefor, and that the claims should therefore be allowed in this distribution.

The auditor apparently determined the question of the Company's liability upon the fact that upon neither of the notes did the name of the Van Haagen Soap Manufacturing Company appear, either as maker, indorsee or otherwise; he was of opinion, therefore, "that the relation of debtor and creditor was not created, and at no time existed between these claimants and the Soap Company." Referring to the Lambert claim he says, in substance, there was some testimony that the money was wanted for the Soap Company, but as the Company was known to be in a not very promising state, he could readily understand why, although having a friendly feeling for the Company Lambert would see to it that the person to whom he advanced the money would be able to repay it when it became due. This he thinks Lambert did. "At the date of these transactions," he says, "Mr. John Hunter's name and credit in the commercial world were without blemish. He occupied the position of receiver of taxes of Philadelphia, was in receipt of a large annual salary, and was otherwise supposed to be a man of great influence and large wealth. It is very certain that at the time indicated he had not the slightest premonition of the financial and family calamity by which he was subsequently overwhelmed. It is quite natural, therefore, that individuals and banks could be found who would be willing to lend their money upon the faith and credit of John Hunter's paper, whilst they would be unwilling to advance it to a corporation which was admittedly hanging on the ragged edge of a stoppage of its operations." "A man who lends his money to another may or may not approve of the use to which his debtor intends to devote the money, but he has the right to say, before he parts with the cash, and he generally does say, upon what terms and on what security he will make the loan. When he stipulates and exacts terms and security, clearly and distinctly expressed in writing, it would be taking great liberty with him and his contract to say that he did not mean what he had caused to be written, but he meant something else of an entirely different character." This is substantially the view taken by the auditor; he fails to find, in any explicit form, what is the controlling fact in the cause,—whether the loan of the money in each case was in fact to the Company or to the parties on the note; that is to say, whether the notes were received as a consideration for the money, or as a security merely.

It is undoubtedly true, if in June, 1885, Hunter had taken the note of Van Haagen to the Bank and there had it discounted, the proceeds passing to his individual credit, without more, the Bank would have been obliged to rely upon the parties to the note for payment; or, as stated in Ex parte Blackburne, 10 Ves. Jr. 204, cited by the appellants: "If there is no antecedent debt, and A carries a bill to B to be discounted, and B does not take A's name upon the bill, if it is dishonored there is no demand, for there was no relation between the parties except that transaction, and the circumstance of not taking the name upon the bill is evidence of a purchase of the bill." It is true, and the appellants contend, that an analogous principle should prevail here, that if a partner borrows a sum of money and gives his own security for it, it does not become a partnership debt merely because it is applied to partnership purposes. Graeff v. Hitchman, 5 Watts, 454.

"It is entirely competent for one partner to borrow money or to buy goods, or to enter into contracts on his sole and exclusive credit with third persons; and on the other hand it is equally competent for them to rely on that exclusive credit, and either to refuse to contract with the firm, or to exonerate the firm from all liability upon any contract which would otherwise bind the firm, as being for their account or benefit." Story, Partn. 184-186.

It may be, also, as was held in Bond v. Atkin, 6 Watts & S. 165, and North Penna. Coal Co's App., 45 Pa. 181, that when there is no antecedent debt, and the partner executes his bond, which is a security of a higher nature, as a consideration for money loaned, it would require stronger proof to establish an express agreement by parol that the partnership was nevertheless to be held for the debt.

Similar principles perhaps apply in certain cases to companies or corporations. "It may therefore be taken to be established," says Lindley on Partnership, 864, "that a partnership or company not liable on a contract when entered into does not become liable upon it by reason of having benefited by it; and further, that a company or partnership which has benefited by a contract, not binding on it, is not to be deemed to have thereby ratified that contract, nor to have incurred an obligation quasi ex contractu, similar to that which would have been incurred if the contract had been binding on the firm or company in the first instance."

As the giving of the note was in this case contemporaneous with the creation of the debt, the presumption, we think, was, that the note was discounted, or that it was given as a consideration, and not as a security for the money.

But this is only a presumption of fact, and may be rebutted by showing the actual intent of the parties to have been otherwise. It is not disputed that Van Haagen and Hunter had the power to bind the Company for borrowed money; it was competent, therefore, for the National Security Bank to show that the money was, in fact, loaned to the Company for the Company's use; that the transaction was not the discount of a note, but a loan of money to the Company, the note being in the nature of a collateral security for the repayment thereof. Maffet v. Leuckel, 98 Pa. 468.

In the case cited, the facts found by the referee were as follows: Maffet & Rhoads, the defendants, during the year 1866 were partners, engaged in building a section of the Lehigh & Susquehanna Railroad. Rhoads applied to the plaintiff, Leuckel, for $200, representing that he wished the same for the purpose of paying the men in the defendants' employ, and thereupon the said amount was advanced by the plaintiff, and the sum was used by Rhoads for the purpose mentioned, he giving the plaintiff his own individual note for the amount. Suit was brought, not upon the note, but for the recovery of the money advanced, and judgment was entered for the plaintiff. When the cause came here this court, in a per curiam, said: "There was nothing in the form of the note produced in evidence to preclude the plaintiff from showing that it was given for a partnership debt; that it was not accepted in satisfaction, but merely as a collateral security. It matters not that the making of the note was contemporaneous with the partnership debt. On the facts found by the referee we are of opinion that the judgment was right."

There can be no doubt but that the money in both cases at bar was borrowed for the use of the Company. Both loans were solicited in the first instance by Van Haagen, to provide means for the purchase of stock and materials for the Company. It is of no consequence that the money was put to the credit of John Hunter, for John Hunter was the Company's banker. He owned practically all of the stock, and the Company's funds were, up to that time at least, supplied from, and deposited in, his private account. The testimony of Van Haagen, Lambert and Connellan in the one case, and of Van Haagen, McGuire, Connellan and Cox, the cashier, in the other, is clear and convincing on this point. The only contradiction is by John Hunter, whose answers to questions put to him are so manifestly equivocating and evasive as to render his testimony very unsatisfactory. But from the tenor of the testimony, as a whole, there can be no conclusion of fact more clear than that both of these loans were effected for the use and benefit of the Van Haagen Soap Manufacturing Co. It is equally clear, not only from what occurred at the time, but before, and after, that this was the understanding of all the parties concerned, not only of Van Haagen, Hunter and the Soap Manufacturing Company, on the one side, but of the Bank and Lambert on the other; and also, that the money ultimately went into the Company and was used in the business. It is unnecessary for us to refer in detail to the evidence. In so doing we would be obliged to extend the bounds of this opinion to an undue extent. What we have said is the result of a careful study of the testimony, and it is only required that we should state our conclusions.

In rebuttal of the presumption which is supposed to arise, in such a case, we have to begin with the fact that the loans were for the Company's use, that all the parties concerned so understood it and that the money was in fact so applied. As to the contemplated liability of the Company to repay the debt, we may, in addition to what has already been said, refer briefly to the testimony. The bank officers regarded Van Haagen and Hunter as the Company. Mr. Gilbach, at the time of the loan, when Cox, the cashier, expressed surprise that the Company's name was not on the paper, replied that the parties to the note were the whole Company. When McGuire came to renew the note, the last time, he asked Cox if the Bank would be willing to renew it. Mr. Cox inquired how the Soap Manufacturing Company was getting along. McGuire replied that they were getting along very well, and that the "Company" would not want the note renewed again; that this was the last. Mr. Connellan, the assignee, testified that shortly after his appointment as assignee, in June, 1889, he had a conversation with Mr. Hunter in the president's room of the Keystone National Bank, and that Hunter said he was very sorry for the National Security Bank; that they had been very kind to him, and the note, which they discounted at the request of Mr. Van Haagen, was really for the benefit of the Van Haagen Soap Manufacturing Co., and should be a claim on the fund in his hands, as assignee. "He also told me," says Mr. Connellan, "there was another note, which had been given to Mr. Van Haagen's son-in-law, Mr. William H. Lambert, and that that should also be a claim on this fund. I told him that I had been over the books of the Company, and that, on the face of the matter at least, the Company was not liable for this loan. He said that Mr. Lambert, at the time he took this note, thought that he, Mr. Hunter, was stronger than the Company, and that that was why the note was signed that way, instead of the Company's note being given."

That the notes were taken for greater security than if signed by the Company cannot be questioned, but if the contract was with and for the Company, the notes would stand as a collateral security for the Company's debt. The learned judge of the court below was of opinion that the testimony was sufficient to rebut the presumption that the notes were taken as a consideration for, or in payment of, the debt, and we are satisfied that he was right.

The decree of the Common Pleas is affirmed, and the appeal dismissed at the cost of the appellants.

PENNSYLVANIA HOSPITAL.

APPEAL OF James Vance QUINTON.

APPEAL OF PRESBYTERIAN HOSPITAL in Philadelphia.

1. The election of a widow to take against her deceased husband's will is equivalent to her death as respects the payment of legacies and the distribution of that part of the estate which is to be distributed under the will upon the happening of that event.
2. The residuary estate must bear the whole loss caused to the beneficiaries by the widow's election to take against the will, and cannot share it with specific legacies if there remains enough to pay the latter, unless there is a plain intention in the will that the residuary legatee is a preferred object of testator's bounty.

A PPEALS from a decree of the Orphans' Court for Philadelphia County dismissing exceptions filed to the distribution ordered by the adjudication in the matter of the account of the executors of James M. Vance, deceased. Reversed.

James M. Vance died July 23, 1887, distributing his estate of upwards of $400,000, by will, as follows: The real estate and the income of his personal estate, after paying certain annuities, to his wife for life. At her death he gave certain specific legacies to nephews and charities, and directed that the residue be distributed among his brothers and sisters and their heirs.

The widow elected to take against the will and was awarded one half of the personal estate absolutely.

The auditing judge decreed that the pecuniary legacies should abate one half in common with the residuary estate and should be paid immediately, and directed distribution on that basis.

These appeals call in question the legality of such distribution.

Messrs. E. F. Hoffman and Biddle & Ward for appellants.

Mr. John G. Johnson for appellees.

NOTE—Wills; rule of election between inconsistent rights.

A person cannot accept and reject the same instrument; and this is the foundation of the Law of Election. Morrison v. Bowman, 29 Cal. 348; Apperson v. Bolton, 29 Ark. 418; Alling v. Chatfield, 48 Conn. 278; George v. Bussing, 15 B. Mon. 558; Young v. Pickens, 49 Ind. 28; Metteer v. Wiley, 34 Iowa, 214; Smith v. Guild, 34 Me. 447; Weeks v. Patten, 18 Me. 42; Parker v. Sowerby, 4 DeG. M. & G. 321; Padbury v. Clark, 3 Macn. & G. 208; Dummer v. Pitcher, 3 Myl. & K. 202; Ustick v. Peters, 4 Kay & J. 427; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 535.

The doctrine of election is the same when applied to a widow claiming a devise under the will of her husband, as it is when applied to any other devisees in the will. Leonard v. Steele, 4 Barb. 22.

The election which a widow is required to make is between rights, and not between benefits; and the choice does not depend on the mention or omission of her in the will, or on the quantum of benefits she receives or renounces under it. Cunningham's Estate, 187 Pa. 621.

The right of a widow to elect between her statutory dower or under her husband's will is a strictly personal right, which can be exercised by her alone, and expires with her death, although it occurs before the expiration of the time for election. Fosher v. Guilleams, 120 Ind. 173, citing 1 Woerner, Administration, 270.

A widow surrendering rights under Intestate Law, and accepting under will, is treated as a purchaser. Finney's App. 3 Cent. Rep. 594, 113 Pa. 11; Reed v. Reed, 9 Watts, 203.

Election to take under will.

The widow is deemed to have elected to take under the will, unless within one year after her husband's death she begins proceedings to recover her dower, or enters on the lands assigned for dower. Lewis v. Smith, 9 N. Y. 504, 511; Jackson v. Churchill, 7 Cow. 287; Bull v. Church, 5 Hill, 208; Church v. Bull, 3 Denio, 430; Leonard v. Steele, 4 Barb. 20; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 532.

By electing to take under the will a widow accepts the benefit conferred by it, and at the same time signifies her intention to assume the trust imposed, under which she is legally responsible only for the original amount,—the principal. Cassidy v. Hynton, 6 West. Rep. 808, 44 Ohio St. 530.

Where a widow in Indiana elected to take under her husband's will, and gave a note for a debt against the estate, which was a charge on the property, her liability on the note is not affected by subsequent proceedings whereby the court releases her from her election to take under the will. Kayser v. Hodopp, 116 Ind. 428.

The fact that the widow did not renounce the provisions in a will only bars her as to those interests as to which such provisions take effect. Ward v. Ward, 9 West. Rep. 173, 120 Ill. 111.

A widow who has acquiesced in a sale of lands under the will of her deceased husband, and made claim to the proceeds, thereby relinquishes her dower, but the fund is to be treated as still realty for the purpose of determining the quantum of her interest therein, which is for life only. Cunningham's Estate, 137 Pa. 621.

She may release all her claims, both at law and under the will, for a specific sum, payable out of the general residue. Stewart's App. 1 Cent. Rep. 580, 110 Pa. 410, citing Sandoe's App. 65 Pa. 314; Galagher's App. 87 Pa. 200.

An election to take under the law, instead of under the will of her husband, is not a contest of his will, within the meaning of Civil Code, making the probate of the will conclusive unless contested within one year. Re Gwin's Estate, 77 Cal. 813.

She is not estopped to make her election to take under the law by causing the will to be probated and becoming the administratrix thereof. Ibid.; Frey's Estate, 53 Cal. 958. See note to McQuerry v. Gilliland (Ky.) 7 L. R. A. 454.

Election, how made.

In making her election the widow must either acquiesce in her husband's will, or disregard it and assert her legal rights, there being no middle course. Cunningham's Estate, 137 Pa. 621.

Whether her filing of a formal paper was voluntary or under the stress of an order from the court is immaterial, such writing, although proper for convenience and certainty of evidence, being otherwise unimportant. Ibid., citing Light v. Light, 22

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These appeals are ruled by Ferguson's Estate (Pa.), 27 W. N. C. 63, decided since the adjudication in the court below. That case was the necessary sequence of Coover's App., 74 Pa. 143; Gallagher's Estate, 76 Pa. 296, and Heineman's App., 92 Pa. 95; and these appeals might be rested on its authority. But out of deference to the opinion of the learned court below and the argument of counsel, we have reviewed the ground there taken as if the question were still open.

The widow's statutory rights in her husband's estate are paramount to his will, and he is presumed to know that fact. It is therefore not accurate to say that his whole scheme of disposition of his property is destroyed by the widow's election. It is disarranged pro tanto, but, in the absence of any reference to such contingency or provision for it in the will, there is ordinarily nothing on which to found a presumption that he would have made any specific difference in distribution had he known she would exercise her right—certainly not that he would have decreased any of the definite pecuniary legacies to swell the amount going at the end of the list to the residuaries. No court is authorized to make a new distribution for the sake of equality. The testator's scheme must be carried out as he made it, except so far as that has been rendered impossible by the widow's action, and in so far a court of equity interferes to preserve an intent which would otherwise be sacrificed. Such interference is the pure creation of equity, and had its origin in the doctrine of equitable election, which compelled one taking a benefit under a will to acquiesce in other provisions of the same instrument which for any reasons were not binding upon him. Equity compelled him to elect, and if he chose to assert his prior rights against the will, the chancellor treated the provision of the will in his favor as forfeited, and then used the benefit created by such provision as a fund to be administered so as to carry out as nearly as might be the purposes of the testator, which would otherwise fail. In England the point arose most frequently in cases where the testator, having only a life estate or a qualified interest or power over the subject, undertook to dispose of a Pa. 407; Bradford v. Kents, 43 Pa. 474; Kennedy v. Johnston, 65 Pa. 451.

Her right of election to take is a statutory privilege which must be exercised in substantial compliance with the statute. Fosher v. Gulliams, 120 Ind. 172; Ewing v. Ewing, 44 Mo. 22; Dougherty v. Barnes, 64 Mo. 159.

She may make her election to claim dower, some years after her husband's death, even where she has received that which was intended to be in lieu of dower, if she acted in any degree in ignorance of her rights. But where she has acted with a full knowledge of her rights, in the acceptance of the testamentary provision instead of her dower, she will be bound by her acceptance. United States v. Duncan, 4 McLean, 100; Re Nagel's Estate, 35 N. Y. S. R. 245.

The object of the Statute undoubtedly was to compel the widow to make her election to take her dower, instead of the jointure or other provisions made in lieu thereof, within a limited period after the death of her husband. Akin v. Kellogg, 39 Hun, 200.

A widow cannot take a portion of her deceased husband's real estate under the will, and also her distributive share under the statute, when to do so would be to take all the real estate, and defeat a devise to a daughter of a portion thereof. Severson v. Severson, 68 Iowa, 656.

By electing to take under the will giving her a life estate, she divests herself of her statutory right to take one third of his lands, but not of her right of inheritance as his heir in respect to a portion of the land as to which he died intestate because a devise thereof had lapsed. Collins v. Collins (Ind.) Nov. 11, 1890.

Election, how manifested.

Where a party is bound to elect between two inconsistent rights, and the contention is that an election has been made by conduct, it must be shown that the party acted with a knowledge of his rights and the real value and condition of the property; that, knowing that he could not hold the property which he was entitled to, and that given to him by the will, he acted with the intention to relinquish the former and accept the latter. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 560; Wilson v. Thornbury, L. R. 10 Ch. 239; Dillon v. Parker, 1 Swanst. 359, 373, 380; Padbury v. Clark, 2 Macn. & G. 298; Spread v. Morgan, 11 H. L. 19 L. R. A.

Cas. 536; 1 Jarman, Wills, 471; 2 Jarman, Wills, Band. & T. ed. 47; Macnet v. Macnet, 29 N. J. Eq. 54; Dabney v. Bailey, 43 Ga. 521; Richart v. Richart, 30 Iowa, 466.

Where the wife and children accept the provisions of the will and carry them out by partition, it will be held, after the death of the wife, that she elected to take under the will, and the remainder given after her life estate will be valid. Rogers v. Trevathan, 67 Tex. 403.

The portions of the real estate which the son was entitled to receive under testator's will, at different periods of his life, would thereupon be segregated from the estate, and the income therefrom would be no longer paid to the beneficiaries named in the will. Ford v. Ford, 70 Wis. 12.

Where a deed was made to plaintiff's husband, and her own name omitted therefrom, which she did not know until his death, by accepting under his will a devise of dwelling-house and other property, with the sum of $10,000, in lieu of dower, the rest of his estate being all willed to others, she must be held to have elected to take under the will, and thereby lost her right to resort to the other remedy. Haack v. Weiken, 43 Hun, 483. See Theilhuson v. Woodford, 13 Ves. Jr. 224; Ker v. Wauchope, 1 Bligh, 21, 22; Tibbits v. Tibbits, 19 Ves. Jr. 633; Havens v. Sackett, 15 N. Y. 355.

Acts which determine an election.

The acts which determine an election are generally of a very decided character. Receiving of a legacy for five years, entering on property and receiving the rents and profits, and an entry into possession and exercising acts of ownership, were held sufficient to constitute an election. English v. English, 3 N. J. Eq. 512, 29 Am. Dec. 736; Ardesoiffe v. Bennet, 2 Dick. 463; Buttrick v. Broadhurst, 1 Ves. Jr. 178; Northumberland v. Aylesford, Amb. 640; Sanger v. Wood, 3 Johns. Ch. 416, 1 L. ed. 603.

Where there is no obligation to elect, conduct indicating an election is explainable and acts done under it revocable. King v. Legrange, 80 Cal. 323.

As to mistake of party's legal rights, see Light v. Light, 21 Pa. 407; Bradford v. Kents, 43 Pa. 475; Adsit v. Adsit, 2 Johns. Ch. 448, 1 L. ed. 446.

To constitute an election by the wife to take under the will of her husband instead of her interest in the community property, it must appear that greater interest to the prejudice of the legatees' legal right. Streetfield v. Streetfield, Cas. t. Talb. 176, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. 897; and see the cases cited in Story, Eq. §§ 1082, 1083, note.

In this country such cases are rare; but the statutory rights of widows as to personalty, as well as dower, have frequently created the same situation, and the same doctrine has been uniformly applied. It was long a debatable question whether the refractory legatee forfeited absolutely all the benefits intended for him by the will, or only so much as might be required to make good that part of the scheme of the testator which his action had disappointed. The question can hardly be said to be entirely at rest yet; but though the foundation of the chancellor's action is a forfeiture by the assertion of a conflicting right, yet the better opinion now certainly is that such forfeiture will be enforced only so far as may be necessary to make good the failure of the testator's other intent; in other words, it is forfeiture only for the purpose and to the extent of compensation.

The American cases, as already noted, arising chiefly from the assertion by a widow of her statutory rights against the provisions of the husband's will, have uniformly treated the benefits intended by the will for her as a fund which could be sequestrated, and used as a trust to carry out the other provisions of the will. But the precise limits of the interference of equity, by way of rearrangement of the distribution of the decedent's estate, do not appear to have been much discussed. None of the cases cited by counsel touch the exact point, how far equity will interfere in behalf of mere residuary legatees, and such research as I have had opportunity to make has found but one. In Firth v. Denny, 2 Allen, 468, there was a fund provided for the widow for life, and after her death one half of it to certain specified legatees, and the residue of the estate, including the other half of the widow's fund, to trustees for charity. The widow elected to take against the will, and thereby took more than the fund set apart for her, but there was enough estate to pay all the definite legacies and leave a balance for the residuaries. The court held that the ultimate loss must of course fall on the residuaries, but she accepted some benefit under the will inconsistent with her claim to one half of the estate. Mayo v. Tudor, 74 Tex. 471, citing Philleo v. Holliday, 24 Tex. 45; Little v. Birdwell, 37 Tex. 691; Morrison v. Bowman, 29 Cal. 347; 4 Kent, Com. 68.

If the widow accepts devises and bequests provided for her by the will of her husband, which disposes of the entire community property, she thereby makes her election and affirms the disposition made by her husband of the community property. Re Stewart, 74 Cal. 66, citing Noe v. Spilvaks, 54 Cal. 502; Morrison v. Bowman, 29 Cal. 347.

An agreement by the widow and the sons, who were the beneficiaries in a will, to sell the house, not carried out, is not an election by the legatees to take the land instead of the proceeds. Baldwin v. Vreeland, 9 Cent. Rep. 667, 43 N. J. Eq. 443. See English v. English, 3 N. J. Eq. 504.

Notice of election by widows.

Where the widow gives a written notice of such election to the person who is in the possession of the land in which she is entitled to dower, or is in possession of the rents and profits thereof, claiming title to the land, and such person thereupon admits her right, and voluntarily pays her a part of the rents and profits of the premises as and for her dower therein, it must, in this court at least, be considered as an assignment of her dower, or an entry on the lands, within the intent and meaning of the statutory provision. Zaegel v. Kuster, 51 Wis. 22.

Where a widow, within a week after the filing of letters testamentary, filed in the probate office a paper stating that she "waives and declines to accept" the provision of her husband's will, and "hereby gives notice that she will claim her dower," it was an election to claim dower, and not merely a waiver of the will; and a subsequent written claim, filed more than two years thereafter, claiming the statutory interest, cannot control the first election. Mathews v. Mathews, 2 New Eng. Rep. 357, 141 Mass. 511.

Where she fails to file her election to accept the provision made for her in the will, within the six months after notice, as required by law, her interest in the personal property under the will being only for life, it is subject to distribution as if there had been no will. Re Foster's Will, 76 Iowa, 366.

Under the Wisconsin Statutes notice of the widow's election must be filed within one year after the death of the husband; and such time is not extended by a stay of proceedings during the pendency of an appeal from an order refusing to admit the will to probate. Albright v. Albright, 70 Wis. 523.

A widow for whom her husband made provision in his will in lieu of dower is bound to know that the law compels her to make her election within a year, and ignorance of the law is no excuse. Akita v. Kellogg, 48 Hun, 459, affirmed in 119 N. Y. 441.

Widow, when put to her election.

To exclude the widow from her legal right either there must be an express declaration to that effect or it must clearly appear that it was testator's intention to give her some interest wholly inconsistent with the enjoyment of that legal right. Young v. Boyd, 64 How. Pr. 215; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 541; Fuller v. Yates, 6 Paige, 325, 4 L. ed. 446; Sanford v. Jackson, 10 Paige, 293, 4 L. ed. 971; Smith v. Kniskern, 4 Johns. Ch. 2, 1 L. ed. 745; Savage v. Burnham, 17 N. Y. 561, 577; Tobias v. Ketchum, 23 N. Y. 319, 323; Vernon v. Vernon, 23 N. Y. 361, 363; Lefevre v. Lefevre, 59 N. Y. 435; Leonard v. Steele, 4 Barb. 20; Leaser v. Leaser, 13 Barb. 106; Mills v. Mills, 23 Barb. 454; Vedder v. Saxton, 46 Barb. 183; Evans v. Webb, 1 Yeates, 424; Hamilton v. Buckwalter, 2 Yeates, 389; Duncan v. Duncan, Id. 303; Webb v. Evans, 1 Binn. 555, 572; Cauffman v. Cauffman, 17 Serg. & R. 16, 26; Preston v. Jones, 9 Pa. 459, 460; Fulton v. Moore, 25 Pa. 468; Cox v. Rogers, 77 Pa. 160; Giddings v. Eastman, 5 Paige, 599, 3 L. ed. 583.

It requires a strong, unequivocal expression or indication of an intent on the part of the testator to bestow the entire property, and not simply his own interest in it, or to bestow the property freed from its incumbrances and charges, in order to raise the necessity for an election between her dower and the legacy in the will. Randlife v. Parkyns, 6 Dow. 135; Maddison v. Chapman, 1 Johns. & H. 470; Wintour v. Clifton, 8 DeG. M. & G. 641; Dummer v. Pitcher, 2 Myl. & K. 262, 5 Sim. 36; Shuttleworth v. Greaves, 4 Myl. & C. 36; Stephens v. Stephens, 1 DeG. & J. 62; Wilkinson v. Dent, L. R. 6 Ch. 389; Grisell v. Swinhoe, L. R. 7 Eq. 391; Havens v. Sackett, 15 N. Y. 365; Lewis v. Smith, 9 N. Y. 502; Bull v. Church, 5 Hill, 206; Sanford v. Jackson, supra; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 533; Fuller v. Yates, supra.

ordered the payment of the definite legacies to be postponed until the actual death of the widow, and the interest upon the fund in the meantime to be paid to the residuaries; and this was done without question, apparently, though the opinion says: "It does not appear exactly to what extent the election made by the widow left the residue of the estate less than it would have been if she had accepted the provision made in the will in her behalf." It was argued by distinguished counsel that the special circumstances showed that the residuary legatees, though lowest in the list, were in truth the chief objects of the testator's bounty, and as they seem to have been given the bulk of the estate there was fair argument for such view; but the court did not put its decision on that ground. The opinion is not fortified by the citation of a single authority, nor is it reasoned out from principles. As already said, the result seems to have been accepted as the unquestionable consequence of the mere fact of the disappointment of the residuary legatees in the amount of the fund coming to them. It may be, however, that the doctrine of acceleration of the time of payment of legacies dependent on the life of the widow, by her election to take against the will, does not obtain in Massachusetts. The opinion of the court in Brandenburg v. Thorndike, 189 Mass. 103, looks in that direction, and if so, it is clear why the judge in Firth v. Denny, supra, thought it unnecessary to go into reasons for the decision. It would, however, at

A bequest, "I give and bequeath unto my beloved wife one-half part of my whole estate, according to law, with the exception of her interest in two indentured servants, and one bay mare hereinafter mentioned," will put the widow to her election. Warren v. Morris, 4 Del. Ch. 238; Burton v. Burton, 4 Harr. (Del.) 38; Horsey v. Horsey, 1 Houst. 438.

The only sufficient and adequate demonstration which, in the absence of express words, will put the widow to her election, is a clear incompatibility arising on the face of the will, between a claim of dower and a claim to the benefit given by the will. Konvalinka v. Schlegel, 6 Cent. Rep. 38, 104 N. Y. 130.

Provisions in will must be inconsistent with dower right.

Where the provisions in a will are clearly inconsistent with the right of dower, the widow will be put to an election. It must be reasonably clear that the provisions were intended in lieu of dower. Wright v. Jones, 2 West. Rep. 354, 105 Ind. 17, citing Kelly v. Stinson, 8 Blackf. 387; Young v. Pickens, 49 Ind. 23; Holdich v. Holdich, 3 Younge & O. 18; Strahan v. Sutton, 3 Ves. Jr. 242; Lasher v. Lasher, 12 Barb. 108; Carroll v. Carroll, 20 Tex. 731; Fuller v. Yates, 8 Paige, 325, 4 L. ed. 446; Brown v. Caldwell, 1 Speer, Eq. 322; 2 Redf. Wills, 738; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 541. See Bond v. McNiff, 3 Jones & S. 94; Sanford v. Jackson, 10 Paige, 271, 4 L. ed. 974.

So where the management of the estate and the power to make repairs are given to trustees they are inconsistent with the right of dower. Wright v. Jones, 2 West. Rep. 354, 105 Ind. 17, citing Parker v. Sowerby, 4 DeG. M. & G. 321; Butcher v. Kemp, 5 Madd. Ch. 61; Roadley v. Dixon, 3 Russ. 122; Miall v. Brain, 4 Madd. Ch. 119; Goodfellow v. Goodfellow, 18 Beav. 354.

The terms and provisions of the will must be totally inconsistent with her claim of dower in the property in which such dower was claimed; so that the intention of the testator in relation to some part of the property devised to others would be defeated if such claim was allowed. Church v. Bull, 3 Denio, 431; Irving v. DeKay, 9 Paige, 533, 4 L. ed. 805.

The devises in the will must be so repugnant to the claim of dower that they cannot stand together. Lewis v. Smith, 9 N. Y. 511.

Where the provisions of the will manifest a clear and unequivocal intention on the part of the testator to bar his wife's dower, it is sufficient, without express words, to put her to her election between the provision made for her in the will and that made for her by law. Stark v. Hunton, 1 N. J. Eq. 216; Colgate v. Colgate, 23 N. J. Eq. 372; Stewart v. Stewart, 31 N. J. Eq. 309; Brokaw v. Brokaw, 4 Cent. Rep. 845, 41 N. J. Eq. 304.

Although the provisions in a will are not declared to be in lieu of dower, yet an authority given to the executors to sell the real estate not devised to the wife, at a price fixed, is inconsistent with a claim for dower, and the widow is put to her election. Vernon v. Vernon, 53 N. Y. 332.

Where the will worked an equitable conversion of the realty into personalty, and vested the executors with the title, the income of a portion of the proceeds, when sold, to be paid to the widow for life, the remainder of the proceeds being absolutely disposed of the widow must elect. Young v. Boyd, 64 How. Pr. 315; Savage v. Burnham, 17 N. Y. 561; Tobias v. Ketchum, 33 N. Y. 319; Adett v. Adett, 2 Johns. Ch. 443, 1 L. ed. 446.

A devise to the widow for life, or during widowhood, of a dwelling-house, with bequest of certain household furniture and cattle, dividing the rest of the real and personal estate between testator's two sons, who were to aid in the widow's support, on request, does not put the widow to her election. Jackson v. Churchill, 7 Cow. 237, 17 Am. Dec. 513; Kennedy v. Nedrow, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 413, 1 L. ed. 303; Evans v. Webb, 1 Yeates, 494, 1 Am. Dec. 303.

A devise to the wife of lands in another State will not bar her dower to lands lying in this State. Van Arsdale v. Van Arsdale, 26 N. J. L. 415; Smith v. Kniskern, 4 Johns. Ch. 9, 1 L. ed. 745; Harrison v. Harrison, 1 Keen, 705; 3 Story, Eq. § 1003, note 4; Staigg v. Atkinson, 4 New Eng. Rep. 351, 144 Mass. 554.

Nor would it affect her right of dower in other lands, which the husband had alienated during coverture. Braxton v. Freeman, 6 Rich. L. 33, 37 Am. Dec. 776; Cunningham v. Shannon, Eq. Mas. H. 407; Borland v. Nichols, 13 Pa. 33, 51 Am. Dec. 573; Gray v. McCune, 23 Pa. 449.

In case of a legacy to the widow with no other mention of her in the will and nothing which by common law or under the statutes of this State put the widow to an election, she was entitled to the legacy in addition to her rights at law in the real estate of her husband. Brown v. Brown, 55 N. H. 103; Parker v. Sowerby, 4 DeG. M. & G. 321; Jackson v. Churchill, 7 Cow. 237; Strahan v. Sutton, 3 Ves. Jr. 242; Ellis v. Lewis, 3 Hare, 310.

Where the testator gave to his wife a legacy of $400 and made no other mention of her in his will and, after other bequests, made B his residuary legatee, the widow was not put to an election, but was entitled to the legacy in addition to her rights at law in the real estate of her husband. Brown v. Brown, Parker v. Sowerby, Jackson v. Churchill and Ellis v. Lewis, supra; Bull v. Church, 5 Hill, 206; Fuller v. Yates, 8 Paige, 325, 4 L. ed. 446; 3 Story, Eq. § 1003; 2 Redf. Wills, chap. 2, § 6.

Where the testator did not declare in express terms that the devise should be in lieu of dower, nor is any such intention deducible by clear and the same time, be ample reason why Firth v. Denny should not be authority in this State, where the doctrine of acceleration is firmly established. Coover's App. 74 Pa. 143.

But the time of payment being held to be accelerated, sound reason requires us to hold that the widow's election shall be treated in all its results as equivalent to her death. The testator's disposition of his estate is interfered with pro tanto, but the court must carry it out as nearly as possible in all other respects. No departure from it can be admitted except from necessity, and then only to the extent that necessity absolutely requires.

The amount of the legacies actually coming to the legatees is only one incident of a will. The order of precedence is another, and it does not seem necessary that the latter should be disturbed because of a change in the former. Hence no provision of the will ought to be interfered with by the court except for the preservation of one of superior, or at least equal, rank in the testator's scheme, and as residuary gifts are from their nature ordinarily the lowest in rank, no others can be interfered with for the sake of benefiting them. From their very definition they come in last, and the testator, with knowledge of this fact, declares that they shall get nothing until after all others are paid in full. Mere diminution of the amounts coming to the residuaries does not in any way justify interference in the regular and established order of priority. When, therefore, it is said, as in Sandoe's App., 65 Pa. 314, that equity will manifest implication from the provisions of the will, she is not compelled to elect between her dower and the devise in her favor, but is entitled to both. Stewart v. McMartin, 5 Barb. 446; Wood v. Wood, 5 Paige, 593, 3 L. ed. 844; Tompkins v. Fonda, 4 Paige, 448, 3 L. ed. 510.

Where a provision in a will is declared to be in lieu of any other interests which the widow might have in testator's estate, the declaration is a condition in her acceptance of the provision made for her: and her election to take under the will is, in legal effect, an abandonment of all other claims against the estate. Langley v. Mayhew, 3 West. Rep. 723, 107 Ind. 193. See Morrison v. Bowman, 29 Cal. 337.

A devise of the testator's whole estate to his widow for life, with remainder over, is not a provision in lieu of dower itself. Lewis v. Smith, 9 N. Y. 512.

But if her acceptance of his bounty be not repugnant to the provisions of the will, she might accept of the donation without the surrender of her right to the half of the community estate. Morrison v. Bowman, 29 Cal. 343.

If the husband makes provision for her by his will, and does not declare that it shall be in lieu of dower, she is, as a general rule, entitled to both the provision and dower. Dodge v. Dodge, 31 Barb. 417, 21 How. Pr. 65, 10 Abb. Pr. 405.

A will made in a State where a gift to the wife would be in addition to dower unless the contrary was expressed does not acquire a new meaning upon the subsequent removal of testator into a State where testamentary gifts are in lieu of dower, unless shown to be in addition to it. Staigg v. Atkinson, 4 New Eng. Rep. 351, 144 Mass. 584; Holmes v. Holmes, 1 Russ. & M. 600.

An estate for life given to a widow by will does not prevent her from taking dower, unless the claim for dower is inconsistent with, and will defeat, some provision of the will. Howard v. Watson, 78 Iowa, 223, citing Dougherty v. Dougherty, 60 Iowa, 677.

If no notice is served upon a widow, she is not bound to make any election, under Iowa Code, in order to enjoy the provision made for her in the will. Howard v. Watson, supra.

An annuity or rent charge in favor of the widow, upon lands in which she is otherwise dowerable, or upon real and personal property devised and bequeathed to others, is not in itself inconsistent with the widow's claim to dower in the same lands. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 551; Lasher v. Lasher, 13 Barb. 103; Hatch v. Bassett, 53 N. Y. 359; White v. White, 18 N. J. L. 203, 211.

Where the annuity abated, any election the widow had made should not impair her right to dower. Hone v. Van Schaick, 7 Paige, 233, 4 L. ed. 126, 20 Wend. 544; Howland v. Hecksher, 3 Sandf. Ch. 519, 7 L. ed. 943; Hindley v. Hindley, 29 Hun, 123 L. R. A.

313; Manice v. Manice, 1 Lana. 343, 43 N. Y. 303; Akin v. Kellogg, 39 Hun, 255.

Where a testator owning an estate in lands only for the life of another makes a will providing for the support during her life of his granddaughter, who was the owner of the estate in remainder, there is no case for an election by her. Bairne v. Von Ahlefeldt, 33 W. Va. 663.

A clause in a will "I give to my mother and to my aunts M. and S. jointly all my interest in the estate on Broad Street, in the City of Providence, where I now reside, to them, their heirs and assigns forever," will not put the widow to her election. The clause devises only the testator's interest, and his interest does not include her interest or right of dower. Durfee, Petitioner, 14 B. L. 54; Charter v. Otis, 41 Barb. 533; 2 Jarman, Wills, 5th Am. ed. 22 et seq.; Drummer v. Pitcher, 2 Myl. & K. 263, 274.

Effect of election by widow.

If a widow whose interest in the community property was devised by her husband has received no benefit under the will inconsistent with her right to claim one half, the heirs of one of the testator's children cannot complain of her election to take her share of the community property, on the ground that such children did not receive a full share of the estate. Mayo v. Tudor, 74 Tex. 471.

The provisions in the Mississippi Code for the renunciation by the widow of a devise or bequest, so that she may secure her dower right, apply only when she is a co-heir, and not where the testator devises only a part of his estate to her, leaving at his death no children or descendants of children. Wall v. Dickens, 66 Miss. 655.

The fact that the widow refuses to take under the will giving her a life estate, with remainder over to residuary legatees, will not invalidate the will as to the latter, who are entitled to take upon satisfying the widow's claim of dower and paying debts of the estate. Re Rawling's Estate (Iowa) Jan. 27, 1891.

Equity treats substituted devises and bequests to the widow as a trust in her for the benefit of the claimants disappointed by her election to take at law to the amount of their interest therein; and the court will sequester the benefit intended for the refusing wife, in order to secure compensation to those whom her election disappoints. Batstone's App. 126 Pa. 307, citing Sandoe's App. 65 Pa. 314; Gallagher's App. 87 Pa. 200.

Devises or bequests subordinate to a life estate in the widow and contingent upon her death, or payment of which is postponed until that time, become presently payable upon her election to take under the Intestate Laws; and such election is, in its effect upon all claims under the will, equivalent to her death. Ferguson's App. (Pa.) 37 W. N. C. 63; Coover's App. 74 Pa. 143.

sequester the benefit intended for the wife to secure provision for those who are disappointed by her action, the disappointment to be understood is the failure of the testator's intent in regard to other beneficiaries. These will be protected, not for their own sakes, but of necessity in order to preserve the wishes of the testator, and such necessity does not extend to the interference with any beneficiaries prior in rank for the sake of the residuaries. One of the chances the latter take from the nature of their position is that the share coming to them may undergo changes in amount before the period of distribution.

There is no force in the argument that the general pecuniary legatees have no cause of complaint at being postponed until the death of the widow, as their legacies by the terms of the will are not payable until that event; for neither are the residuary legatees. The advancement of the time of payment is the legal consequence of the termination of the purpose of the postponement, and both the definite and the residuary legatees share this advantage in common. To postpone the definite legatees and transfer the income of their legacies to the residuaries during the widow's life, is not in furtherance of any direction of the will, but in direct violation of the testator's intent that the definite legacies should be paid in full before the residuaries get anything. Nor is it in pursuance of the equitable doctrine of sequestration of the benefits intended for the widow, for, as already said, that never ought to reverse the testator's order of priority. Nor does it even accomplish, except by accident, its nominal purpose of preserving the relative amounts as they were at the testator's death. The exact figures in the present case we have not before us, but the possibilities of the plan adopted were shown very forcibly by the illustration of one of the appellant's counsel at the argument. If the general legacies were $100,000, and the residue at the time of the testator's death $5,000, the sequestration of the interest on the former for the benefit of the latter would give the latter an income of one hundred per cent a year during the widow's life. Of course no court of equity would apply the plan without modification to such a case, and the omission of the court in Firth v. Denny, supra, to require the exact figures was probably because it was understood all around that even with the income during the widow's life the residuaries would still be the losers. But such a possible result could only be avoided by a balancing of accounts in each case that would be beyond the sphere even of a court of equity. How far a sum in hand is preferable or otherwise to a larger sum at an indefinite future date is a problem with too many elements of personal preference, necessity and circumstance, to be solved by a court upon the rates of interest and tables of the expectancy of life. As said in Ferguson's Estate, supra, the law must have a settled and uniform rule, and it is that as to provisions in a will for legacies subordinate to a life interest in the widow and contingent upon her death, or payment of which is postponed till then, her election to take against the will is equivalent to her death. By such election the widow takes her share as if the husband had died intestate, and the will then operates on the residue of the estate precisely as if the widow were dead. A court of equity will interpose, if necessity requires, to preserve the intention of the testator from destruction, but such interposition never should take place in favor of a subordinate as against a preferred or superior intent, and therefore never in favor of a residuary as against a definite legatee unless upon a plain implication in the will that the residuary legatee was in fact a preferred object of the testator's bounty. There is nothing in the will of the testator, Vance, to require any departure from the general rule thus expressed.

James T. HOLLAND, Admr., etc., Appt.,
v.
TENNESSEE COAL, IRON & R. CO.

(....Ala....)

1. If work may be well done by unskilled and inexperienced persons, a master is not negligent in respect to his duty to other employes by employing them.
2. Evidence that many well regulated furnaces habitually employ inexperienced men for a particular service is admissible on the question of negligence in employing such men for that kind of work in a furnace.
3. A master need not instruct his employes as to an open and unobscured danger from a boiler of iron so situated that the melted iron would flow into the trench where the men are working, if a wall of earth between the trench and the boiler was broken through.

NOTE.—As to master's duty to instruct his servant, in regard to dangers incident to the employment, see notes to Brennan v. Gordon (N. Y.) 8 L. R. A. 818; Brazil Block Coal Co. v. Gaffney (Ind.) 4 L. R. A. 880.

4. The danger of flying molten iron when a boiler of iron is punctured should be pointed out to employes working in a trench into which the iron would flow if a wall of earth was punctured, and who would be instantly enveloped by the flying metal if it should be thrown out.

5. The fact that one is panic stricken and his energies paralyzed by the awful nature of an impending catastrophe will not relieve him from the duty of exercising diligence in attempting to escape or condone negligence in case he is guilty of it, but it may be considered in determining what effort would amount to due diligence or what omission of effort would amount to negligence under all the circumstances.

6. An instruction subject to criticism in the abstract is not prejudicial if it was correct when tested by the only evidence in the case to which it could relate.

(December 2, 1890.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Defendant owned and operated a smelting furnace. Plaintiff's intestate was employed by defendant in the capacity of a stock-house man. Help was needed at the furnace to dig a trench to draw off a "boil" of iron, and the superintendent of the furnace sent to the stock-house for the needed assistance. Plaintiff's intestate and two other stock-house men were delegated for that service. The men so delegated were unfamiliar with the work assigned to them. Such work involved no special danger, as the trench is never dug so close to the "boil" but that a sufficient wall of earth is left between the "boil" and the trench to confine the molten metal until the men are out of the trench, when the remaining wall is punctured.

The superintendent directed the men how to do the work, and at the proper time told them to get out of the ditch, at the same time telling them not to puncture the wall confining the molten metal. Notwithstanding this instruction one of the men in some way did puncture it before the men were out of the trench, and the molten iron ran out and upon the men, burning plaintiff's intestate so severely that he died.

The further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. J. M. Chilton and Cabaniss & Weakley, for appellant:

The law imposes on the master the duty of seeing to it that only suitable and competent persons are employed to discharge his work, and that incompetent servants are not retained. This duty he owes to each of his servants, with regard to fellow servants, and is answerable for injuries resulting from his want of care or skill in these respects.

It is not necessary in order to charge the master that he should have known of the incompetency of the servant. If by the use of due care and diligence he could have discovered it he is liable.

Messrs. Hewitt, Walker & Porter and R. H. Pearson for appellee.

McClellan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages for personal injuries to appellant's intestate resulting in his death. The complaint contains three counts, each of which relies upon the negligence of the defendant Company, and not upon that of fellow servants. The case is therefore not brought under the Employe's Act (§ 2590 et seq., Code). The first count alleges that the defendant, being engaged in the business of operating a furnace for the purpose of smelting iron ore, so negligently conducted said business as to cause molten iron to come in contact with the person of plaintiff's intestate, inflicting injuries from which he died a few days afterwards. The second and third counts proceed on the theory that the defendant negligently employed incompetent servants in the particular work upon which they and the intestate were engaged at the time of the accident, and the injury resulted from the incompetency of these co-servants of the intestate. The trial developed three controverted issues: (1) whether defendant was negligent in employing stock-house men having no special knowledge, skill or experience to do the work in which the injury occurred; (2) whether defendant was negligent in failing to instruct said employes as to the perils incident to the work they were put to do; and (3) whether plaintiff's intestate was himself guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to the injury.

1. With respect to the care a master or employer must exercise in the selection of servants and in the use of machinery and appliances in his business, our own decisions, following long and well established principles, leave no room for doubt. The master is in no case an insurer of the absolute safety of the appliances and machinery employed in the business. He is in no case held to an undertaking to select absolutely competent and careful servants. The rule requires of him no more than the exercise of reasonable care in either case—such care only as men of reasonable and ordinary prudence exercise; and when he has done this he cannot be held responsible for injuries which result from the incompetency of servants, or latent defects in machinery so selected and employed. The only further duty then upon him is the exercise of care in ascertaining any incompetency of the servant or defect in the machinery which the service may develop, and thereupon discharging the one and discarding the other. The selection of a servant must, of course, be made with a view to the nature of the employment. If it involves special knowledge or experience, only men of special knowledge and experience should be employed. If the work may be well done by the unskilled and inexperienced, it cannot be said that the master was lacking in the measure of care he owes to other employes should he employ unskilled and inexperienced men upon it. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Thomas, 43 Ala. 672;

Smoot v. Mobile & M. R. Co. 67 Ala. 18; Tyson v. South & North Ala. R. Co. 61 Ala. 354; Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Smith, 59 Ala. 245.

2. The men employed in the work of cutting a trench for the purpose of drawing off the boil of molten iron were stock-house men. It appears that the ordinary duties of such men were not such as to afford them any training or experience with respect to the work these employes were put to do, and it did not appear in fact that they had had any experience or training. As bearing on the question of defendant's care and diligence in employing them for this purpose, evidence was received, against plaintiff's objection, that many well-regulated furnaces habitually employed this class of men for this particular service. The assignments of error bring under review the ruling of the court in this regard. It is admitted in argument, and fully established in our decisions, that the custom and usage of other well-regulated businesses of the like kind as to the use of certain machinery and mechanical appliances may always be adduced in evidence as tending to negative the charge of negligence when that charge is based upon the use of such machinery or appliances by the defendant. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Allen, 78 Ala. 494; Georgia Pac. R. Co. v. Propst, 88 Ala. 518; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Arnold, 84 Ala. 159.

But it is insisted that the same rule does not apply with respect to the employment of human beings. We are unable to perceive any sound reason for this insistence, at least as applied to this case. The presumption is that well-regulated furnaces exercise due care in the conduct of their business. If it is customary for them to employ a particular class of men for a particular purpose, the further presumption is that that class of men is competent for the work in hand; and their competency may be the result either of special knowledge or experience with respect to the particular thing to be done, or from the work being such as to require no special knowledge or experience. In either case, the fact of the custom or usage of prudently managed furnaces to employ that class of men is some evidence that the defendant Company was not guilty of negligence in their employment.

Whether the defendant was negligent or not in failing to notify and instruct the intestate and his fellow servants as to the dangers of the work they were directed to do depends upon the further consideration whether the peril involved in it was patent or latent,—such as could be seen and known by ordinary care and prudence in the use of the senses, or such as was obscured and could not be seen or appreciated. If the former, the law is well settled that the master need not advise his servants of its existence, and instruct them as to the means necessary to its avoidance, since they, equally with himself, are held to know both the fact of peril and how to avoid or escape it. Wood, Mast. and S. § 836; Perry v. Marsh, 25 Ala. 659; 2 Thomp. Neg. p. 971, § 2, p. 979, § 9; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 203. On the other hand, it is the imperative duty of the master to inform the servant of all latent dangers incident to the service, and instruct him as to their avoidance. Wood, Mast. and S. § 854, and authorities supra.

The evidence tended in some degree to show two distinct elements of danger incident to the work upon which the plaintiff's intestate was engaged when the injury was suffered,—one open to ordinary observation and capable of being measured and judged of by men of no special knowledge or instruction in the premises; and the other latent in character, with nothing which could be seen and understood by the unskilled and uninstructed to give warning of its presence, or suggest means of avoiding it. The boil of iron, while its lower part had sunk down considerably—two and a half or three feet, may be—into the earth, yet protruded above the surface, and was visible to those engaged in cutting the trench. It was common knowledge, appreciable by inexperienced as well as experienced persons, that if the ditch was open entirely up to the melted mass, its bottom being below the lowest estimated point of the boil, the iron would immediately flow into and along the trench, thus imperiling those who should be in there at the time. This was the open and unobscured danger which was sought to be guarded against by leaving a wall of earth between the trench and the boil of from eight to twelve inches thick, the purpose being to break down this wall by piercing it with a long crow-bar after the laborers had left the trench. Of such a patent danger there was no duty on the defendant to give the employes warning. The other peril arose from the fact, supported by a tendency of the evidence here, that a boil of iron, upon being punctured and having its shell broken, bursts and throws out molten metal in all directions—"explodes," as some of the witnesses stated as to this one, though this term was said to be inapt and inaccurate by others. Of this peril,—the danger of this flying molten iron,—resulting from unseen and unappreciated conditions and forces, the inexperienced man would know nothing by the exercise of his senses. It was a state of things which would not address itself to his comprehension, and of which he could only come to a knowledge by being instructed in regard to it. We are of the opinion that plaintiff's intestate and his fellow servants should have been advised of this latent danger when they were put to work so near the boil as that the lack of ordinary prudence and care on their part might not only have started the flow of iron into the trench—this they could see and perhaps could have escaped from—but also have instantly enveloped them in the flying metal—which they could not anticipate, and from which there was no time to escape. Smith v. Peninsular Car Works, 60 Mich. 501.

Whether, in point of fact, however, this latent danger did exist, was a question for the jury. It was also for their determination whether, conceding its existence, the injury resulted from it, from the natural flow of the metal along the trench, or from both combined. They might have reached either one of the four possible conclusions in this connection. If they found the latent danger referred to did exist, then they could not have rendered a verdict against the defendant for negligence in failing to give notice of the patent danger, since no such duty rested on the defendant. If their conclusion was that, although the latent peril was incident to the thing being done, yet that the men were burned to death by the metal flowing down along the ditch—the injury thus being produced by the patent danger, in respect to which there was no duty of instruction upon the defendant—it still cannot be said that the accident was chargeable to defendant's negligence in failing to give proper warning of the unseen peril, which did not cause the injury complained of. We assume that the jury were correctly instructed as to defendant's liability, if they found the existence of the unseen danger, that the injury resulted from it, and that there was a negligent failure on the part of those who represented the furnace company to instruct its servants in regard to it, since the record indicates nothing to the contrary. The instructions which were given, as shown by the record, for the defendant, and which proceeded on the theory, supported by one aspect of the evidence, that the only danger incident to the work was an open and unobscured one, or that whether the only one or not, it produced the injury, were to the effect that if the jury found the danger to be one that could be readily seen by common observation, and this danger was set in motion, so to speak, by an act of intestate's co-laborer, against which he had been warned and instructed, the defendant was not liable, etc., are correct expositions of the law applicable to that phase of the facts.

3. The action being for the negligence of the master, and not under the statute for that of a fellow servant, it follows, of course, that the defendant is not liable for an injury produced by an act of intestate's fellow servant, done not only beyond the scope of his employment, but against the express orders of the defendant's agent in charge of the work. We understand charges 1 and 2 to assert this doctrine. There was evidence tending to support the facts they hypothesize. If there was another state of facts which the evidence tended to support, and upon which the defendant would be liable for the act referred to, and the plaintiff apprehended the charges as given might mislead the jury by obscuring this other aspect of the evidence, he should have asked an explanatory charge, or an independent instruction, upon that phase; and, for aught the record shows, such a charge may have been asked and given.

4. It only remains to be considered whether the instructions given in respect of the alleged contributory negligence of plaintiff's intestate were correct. Charges 7 and 8 on this subject, to the effect, respectively, that the jury "cannot find for the plaintiff if you believe from the evidence that the injury to plaintiff's intestate was in part caused by his own negligence, and that such negligence on his part proximately contributed to his injury," and that "it was the duty of plaintiff's intestate to have used due diligence in trying to get out of the way of the molten iron, when he saw it flowing towards him in the ditch (if you believe he saw it, or could have seen it by the exercise of due care), and if he failed to do so, and because of such failure he was burned and injured, then you must find for the defendant," are manifestly sound statements of the doctrine of contributory negligence. The fact, if it be one, that the intestate was panic-stricken, and his energies paralyzed, by the awful nature of the impending catastrophe, might be proper to be considered by the jury in determining what effort would amount to due diligence, or what omission of effort would be negligence under all the circumstances, but no such consideration can relieve from the duty of diligence on the one hand, or condone negligence on the other.

5. Charge 5, given for defendant, is in the following language: "If you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's intestate was guilty of negligence, I charge you that however slight that negligence on his part may have been, if it was such that but for that negligence the accident could not have happened, the plaintiff cannot recover." There are very respectable authorities which hold that the abstract proposition of this instruction is sound. Murch v. Concord R. Corp. 29 N. H. 9; Potter v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 21 Wis. 873.

We apprehend, however, that the language employed is open to criticism, if not to condemnation, for that a case may be conceived in which the negligence of the party injured, while such as that without it the injury would not have been inflicted, yet is not the proximate cause of accident. We need not decide this, however. The charge may be sustained on another consideration. All charges must be referred to and tested by the evidence in the cause. Applying that principle here, and looking to the testimony, it is seen that the only negligence on the part of plaintiff's intestate which finds any lodgment in the tendencies of the evidence, and, therefore, the only negligence to which the charge can be held to relate, consisted in the injured party's failing to get out of the ditch when he was ordered to do so, or when he saw or should have seen the molten iron flowing towards him. Unquestionably, this was proximate contributory negligence (Columbus & W. R. Co. v. Bradford, 86 Ala. 574), and the charge, construed with reference to it, becomes a proper statement of the law, or at least is shorn of all capacity to work prejudice to the plaintiff before the jury.

may be determined by lot does not violate a constitutional provision that all elections shall be by ballot.

4. A candidate is not estopped from obtaining a writ of mandamus to compel election officers to decide a tie vote by lot according to law, by the fact that he requested them not to do so, since all parties had equal knowledge of the law and the duty was to the public and not simply to the candidate.

(April 8, 1891.)

APPPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Decatur County in favor of relator in a proceeding instituted to compel defendants to determine by lot the person entitled to a certain office as the result of an election at which a tie vote was cast. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. D. A. Myers and Bonner, Tockett & Bennett for appellant.

Messrs. Miller & Gavin and Ewing & Ewing for appellee.

ELLIOTT, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator, Oliver C. Sefton, William A. Williams and James Parker were candidates for the office of township trustee. Alexander C. Johnston was the inspector, and Samuel T. Meek and John Foley were the judges of the election. At the close of the election the votes cast were counted and canvassed by the election board, and it was found that the relator had received eighty-nine votes, Williams eighty-nine votes and Parker two votes. The election officers certified that the relator and Williams had received the highest number of votes cast at the election. They refused, however, to determine by lot which of the two candidates were entitled to the office; and, although requested in writing, refused to re-assemble and determine which of the two candidates who received the highest number of votes should be declared entitled to the office of township trustee. Our Statute provides that, "if two or more have the highest and an equal number of votes for the same office, such judges shall, when the result is certified, determine by lot the person entitled to the office; and the next day the inspector shall make out and deliver to the person elected, when demanded, a certificate to each person elected to any office in said township, except justices of the peace." Rev. Stat. § 4786.

Assuming that the statutory provision quoted is valid, the remedy adopted by the relator, mandamus, is appropriate. The duties of election officers when prescribed by statute, as in this instance, are imperative, and performance may be coerced by the writ of mandamus. Nor can the election officers evade their duties by adjourning without taking the action required by law. In discussing this question the Supreme Court of Michigan said, in the case of Atty-Gen. v. Iron County Board of Canvassers, 64 Mich. 607, in speaking of the members of the election board, that "until they have done so they have no right to dissolve their meeting. They can only get out of their office by completing their work. It would be worse than absurd to allow a board of canvassers to defeat the popular will and destroy an election by neglecting to do what the law requires them to do."

The cases are harmonious upon the proposition we have asserted. Brouwer v. O'Brien, 2 Ind. 423; Kistler v. Cameron, 89 Ind. 498; Moore v. Kessler, 59 Ind. 153; State v. Gibbs, 18 Fla. 55, 7 Am. Rep. 233; Hagerty v. Arnold, 13 Kan. 367; Lewis v. Marshall County Comrs. 16 Kan. 102, 23 Am. Rep. 275; People v. Schidlein, 95 N. Y. 124; State v. Stearns, 11 Neb. 104; State v. Peasock, 15 Neb. 442; People v. Nordheim, 99 Ill. 553.

The question upon which the case hinges is, whether the statutory provision quoted is valid. The appellant's counsel ingeniously and plausibly argue that the provision is invalid for the reason that it is in conflict with the provision that all elections shall be by ballot. Const. art. 2, § 13.

We cannot concur with counsel that where an election is held and results in a tie vote for opposing candidates, the General Assembly may not provide for determining the right to the office otherwise than by making provision for another election.

Constitutions are framed by existing and organized society, and are to be construed with reference to well-known practices and usages. State v. Noble, 118 Ind. 350-361, 4 L. R. A. 101; Durham v. State, 117 Ind. 477; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 73.

We know that the practice of determining a tie vote by lot prevailed before our Constitution was adopted, and it is our duty to presume that the framers of that instrument were not ignorant or unmindful of this ancient usage. It is therefore no more than reasonable to hold that a statute providing for an election by ballot is valid, although it also provides for determining a tie vote by lot, for the framers of the Constitution may well be deemed to have had this usage in view and to have intended that it should be resorted to in case where an election should result in a tie between opposing candidates. Such a statute as the one before us does give the electors an opportunity to vote by ballot, and affixes to each vote all the force it is possible to assign it. In no respect is the elector's right abridged or limited; all that is done is to provide that in cases where the electors fail to make a choice the choice may be determined by lot between the candidates who have received the highest number of votes. This course gives to all the votes cast full weight and force, and prevents the nullification of the election where a tie vote results. Unless there is power in the General Assembly to provide for the determination of a tie vote, an incumbent of an office might hold far beyond his term, since it is conceivable that many elections might result in a tie.

The authorities give full support to our assertion that the Legislature may provide that a tie vote may be determined by lot. Webster v. Gilmore, 91 Ill. 824; People v. Robertson, 27 Mich. 118; People v. Sutherland, 41 Mich. 177; State v. McKinnon, 8 Or. 501; State v. Wilkinson, 28 Neb. 711; Hammock v. Barnes, 4 Bush, 891.

We have found no judicial decision conflicting with the cases to which we have referred, nor have we been referred to any by appellant's counsel. The report of the congressional committee to which we are referred cannot be regarded as authority.

While we are satisfied that no statute can be upheld which assumes to destroy the right of the inhabitants of a township to elect their own trustees, yet we are also satisfied that where a full opportunity is given them to make a choice, and they equally divide their votes, it is within the power of the General Assembly to make provision for determining the result of the election. Our Constitution provides that "such other county and township officers as may be necessary shall be elected or appointed in such manner as may be prescribed by law." Art. 6, § 3.

It seems clear to us that, taking this provision in connection with the general one respecting elections, and construing them in accordance with the principles to which we have referred, the General Assembly did not transcend its power in enacting the Statute under consideration.

Counsel's argument that the policy of determining the right to an office by lot is an evil one might have weight with a legislative assembly, but it can have none with the courts. Questions of policy and expediency are legislative and not judicial. Beauchamp v. State, 6 Blackf. 299; Hedderich v. State, 101 Ind. 564, and authorities cited.

The appellant's position that the relator cannot successfully urge his claim to the office for the reason that he created an estoppel against himself by requesting the election officers not to determine the result of the election cannot be defended. The duties of the election officers were prescribed by a public law, and all the interested parties had equal knowledge so that no estoppel could possibly arise. But more than this, the public had an interest in having the election officers perform the duty enjoined upon them by law, and it was not for the relator to relieve them from that duty, and this they were bound to know. School Dist. No. 8 v. Root, 61 Mich. 878.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Oliver T. HOPPER, Resp't.,

v.

Mary C. HOPPER, Exrx., etc., of Inalee
A. Hopper, Deceased, Appt.

(....N. Y.....)

1. A foreign executor becomes a domestic executor liable to be sued as such in the State in which he takes out ancillary letters.
2. A nonresident plaintiff may sue a foreign executor who has taken out ancillary letters although the precise force and effect of the judgment in such a case is not determined.

(January 27, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing a judgment of the New York Special Term dismissing the complaint in an action brought to charge the estate of a deceased partner with a partnership debt. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. Robert T. B. Easton for appellant. Mr. Horace Secor, Jr., with Mr. Charles B. Page, for respondent.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of court:

The last will of Inalee A. Hopper, a resident of New Jersey, was admitted to probate in that State, and letters testamentary issued thereon to Mary C. Hopper. The testator had been engaged in business as a broker in connection with other parties in the City of New York, and the executrix, presumably because there were assets in this State, took out ancillary letters testamentary within our jurisdiction. The plaintiff was and is a resident of the State of Georgia. He had dealt with the firm in the City of New York of which the testator was a member, and claimed, as a result of that dealing, that it became indebted to him in a large amount. Coming into this State, and finding the executrix here, clothed with testamentary authority under our law, and seeking to recover a debt which originated here, he brought this action against her, in her representative capacity, alleging the insolvency of the surviving members of the firm, and asking judgment for the amount which he claimed to be due. He was defeated at the special term, but, on appeal, that judgment was reversed, and from that reversal the executrix appeals to this court. Her counsel advocated here the doctrine which prevailed in the trial court—that the ancillary executor, by reason of the temporary purpose of his appointment, and the restricted limitation of his duties, does not become a domestic executor, liable to be sued here, and that the defendant, who was a foreign executor by the issue of her original letters, remained such, notwithstanding her ancillary appointment in this State.

By the phrase "foreign executor," the courts never mean the mere nonresidence of the individual holding the office, but the foreign origin of the representative character. That is the sole product of the foreign law, and, depending upon it for existence, cannot pass beyond the jurisdiction of its origin. The individual may come here and acquire rights or incur liabilities which our tribunals will defend or enforce, but he can have no representative rights or liabilities, since we recognize in him no representative character. The foreign executor may make a contract here which our courts will compel him to perform because it is his contract, but, where it is the testator's only, he cannot sue or be sued upon it, since the right or the liability is purely representative, and exists only by force of the official character, and so cannot pass beyond the jurisdiction which gave it. Johnson v. Wallis, 112 N. Y. 230, 2 L. R. A. 828.

And thus it is not the residence of the executor out of the State which makes him a foreign executor, but the creation of his official character under and by force of a law foreign to our own. He may, nevertheless, become an executor, and clothe himself with a representative character under our law, and by force of an authority conferred within our jurisdiction. The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure indicate when and in what manner. By the terms of section 2695, the surrogate having jurisdiction may, upon production of an exemplified copy of the foreign will, and the foreign letters and probate, issue to the executor ancillary letters testamentary. He thereby necessarily acquires an official and representative character under our law, and becomes an executor here.

In Cummings v. Banks, 2 Barb. 603, he is correctly described as "an officer of our State, acting under our laws." As a consequence he gains a standing in our courts which in the character of foreign executor merely was denied to him. Having thus become the lawful representative of the testator in our jurisdiction, he may sue in our tribunals as such representative. It seems to follow that in that character he may also be sued. The courts are thrown open to him, when he sues as an executor here, representing the estate by our authority. He has become a domestic executor. Is he any the less so when some creditor of the estate sues him? Before the Code and before the Revised Statutes the foreign executor who came into our jurisdiction, and intermeddled with assets here, could be sued as executor de son tort. The law regarded him not as foreign executor, but as executor here, having made himself such by his own wrongful conduct. Campbell v. Tousey, 7 Cow. 65. Now that such remedy is abolished, and a way opened for a rightful possession of assets, founded on an official character, granted by our law to the ancillary executor, the right to sue him in that representative character would seem to be still more certain and plain. I do not understand that to be denied where the plaintiff is citizen of our own State, but only where he is a non-resident. What has been said allows of no such discrimination. The ground of the citizen's action is that the defendant is not a foreign executor whom he cannot sue, but an executor here, whom he can sue. How is the defendant any the less an executor here because the creditor is a nonresident? Let us suppose that the transaction in New York upon which this suit was brought had been with the testator alone, instead of with a firm of which he was a member; that the citizen of Georgia came here to settle up the account, and that the ancillary executor, claiming he was a debtor in the dealing, had sued him in our courts. Nobody doubts or disputes the right to do so. But can it then be true that, the balance being the other way, the nonresident cannot sue the ancillary executor to establish his claim? A nonresident may sue a domestic executor in this State beyond any question. Does it alter the rule that the domestic executor has become such by receiving ancillary instead of original letters? The Code provides (section 2703) that all the provisions of its 18th chapter, relating generally to surrogates' courts, and proceedings therein, and to the rights, powers, duties and liabilities of an executor or administrator, shall, with some minor exceptions, apply to a person to whom ancillary letters are granted, and thus puts him upon a level, so far as his official character is concerned, with the ordinary executors appointed by our courts.

Two things are said, however, as peculiar to the case of a nonresident plaintiff. One is that he must show some statutory authority for the right to sue, and without it can have none. I do not think the right was ever denied where the cause of action accrued within our boundaries. Indeed, it has been said that one nonresident may sue another in our courts for a tort committed abroad, so far as the question of actual jurisdiction is concerned, and that we simply decline the jurisdiction from motives of policy and convenience, not that we do not have it. Gardner v. Thomas, 14 Johns. 184.

The provisions of the Code do not originate, but simply restrain, the original jurisdiction. Thus it is provided by section 1780 that an action may be maintained against a foreign corporation by another foreign corporation, or by a nonresident, "in one of the following cases only." The word "only" is inserted as a word of restriction, and implies a general jurisdiction, purposely narrowed and restrained. Robinson v. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. 112 N. Y. 815, 2 L. R. A. 686.

One of the cases is where the action is for breach of a contract made within the State, and, in the case last cited, it was declared that permitting the suit, irrespective of residence, where the cause of action arose here, is a rule of comity, of natural justice and of convenience. Why, when there is an executor here, where the transaction arose, and the witnesses are at hand, should we send the nonresident to New Jersey to sue the same person in the same representative character there? The answer made to that inquiry is the second position taken by the appellant, and grows out of the restricted duty enjoined upon the ancillary executor. He must remit all collected assets to the original probate jurisdiction, unless there are creditors who are citizens of our own State, in which event a distribution may be ordered here. Code, §§ 2700, 2701. And it has been doubted whether a creditor, not a citizen of this State, can prevent such transmission, or obtain any relief against the assets here. Moyer v. Weil, 1 Dem. 71. While I feel the force of that doubt, I am unwilling to yield to it as in all cases conclusive. But, assuming that to be the truth, the argument is that a judgment against the ancillary executrix would have no possible force or effect, and our courts do not sit to decide a mere abstract question, or perform an idle ceremony. If the judgment is utterly ineffective, at least the defendant may view its recovery with equanimity. But it is not ineffective, as the general term points out. While we are not required for present purposes to decide upon its legitimate force and effect, and that question should be left until it arises, it is enough to say that the judgment may avail the plaintiff in two directions, even if it were certain that he could not reach assets here. If he should be driven to the forum of original probate jurisdiction, the case of Hill v. Tucker, 84 U. S. 18 How. 458, 14 L. ed. 223, indicates that the judgment would be at least prima facie evidence of the indebtedness, and, while not conclusive, would, at least, bar the Statute of Limitations, which otherwise might apply. In that case the testator, a resident of Virginia, died in that State, leaving a will, by which he appointed two residents of Virginia, and two of Louisiana, executors. The will was proved in both States, the Virginia executors taking out letters there, and one of the Louisiana executors qualifying in that jurisdiction. In a suit against the latter, by a creditor who had obtained judgment in Virginia against the executors there, the federal court held the judgment admissible, and an answer to the Statute of Limitations. Much more would it seem to be true, where the executors in the two jurisdictions were not different persons, but the same individual, who himself, in his representative character, had appeared and defended in the one jurisdiction, that, in the other, the judgment would at least prima facie establish the claim, and answer a plea of the Statute of Limitations. And so, while we do not feel bound to determine, at present, the precise force and effect of the judgment, we are satisfied that its recovery ought not to be defeated on the ground that it is ineffective for any purpose.

The judgment of the general term should be affirmed, and judgment absolute on her stipulation be awarded against the defendant, with costs.

All concur.

(....Or.....)

*1. Time is not of the essence of a contract for the sale of real estate unless made so by the express agreement of the parties, or by *Head notes by BMAN, J.

NOTE.—Specific performance; action to enforce.

"Specific performance" is the actual accomplishment of a contract,—such a performance as will do justice to the parties. Connaway v. Wright, 5 Del. Ch. 472.

Even where time is made material by express stipulation, the failure of one of the parties to perform a condition within the particular time limited will not defeat his right to specific performance if the condition be subsequently performed without unreasonable delay, and no circumstances have intervened that would render it unjust or inequitable to give such relief. Cheney v. Libby, 124 U. S. 68, 33 L. ed. 518.

If the parties have expressly treated time as of the essence of the agreement, or if it necessarily follows from the nature and circumstances of the agreement, courts of equity will not enforce it specifically, regardless of the limitation of time. Coleman v. Applegarth, 10 Cent. Rep. 149, 68 Md. 21; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 776.

A default at the day specified, without any just excuse, or any acquiescence or subsequent waiver by the other party, will defeat the suit. Benedict v. Lynch, 1 Johns. Ch. 370, 1 L. ed. 176; Hayes v. Caryl, 5 Vin. Abr. 528, pl. 18; Pincke v. Curteis, 4 Bro. Ch. 329; Fordyce v. Ford, Id. 494.

Enforcement in discretion of court.

The specific enforcement of contracts to convey lands is not a matter ex debito iustitiae. It is an appeal to the sound discretion of the court. Relief of this character rests not upon what the court must do, but rather upon what, in view of all the circumstances, it ought to do. Page v. Martin, 46 N. J. Eq. 325; Alexander v. Wunderlich, 11 Cent. Rep. 378, 118 Pa. 610; Jackson v. Torrence, 33 Cal. 521.

It will not be decreed where it will result in great hardship and injustice to one party without any consideration, gain or utility to the other, or where the nature of the contract itself or of the circumstances under which it was made. Courts of equity will ordinarily infer that interest on the deferred payments will be a sufficient compensation for the delay.

2. Although there is no stipulation in the contract that time shall be essential, nor anything in the nature or circumstances of the agreement to make it so, it can nevertheless be made so by a performance or tender of performance by one party and a demand of the other.

the public interest would be prejudiced thereby. Conger v. New York, W. S. & B. R. Co. 120 N. Y. 22, citing Clarke v. Rochester, L. & N. F. R. Co. 18 Barb. 360; *Columbia College Trustees v. So denial of a specific performance is in the discretion of the court where performance is onerous and would cause little or no benefit. Murtfeldt v. New York, W. S. & B. R. Co. supra. See Columbia College Trustees v. Thacher, supra.

A vendee in an executory contract for the purchase of land has not an absolute right to a specific performance of the contract, but such relief is granted or refused according to the circumstances of each case. *Hayes v. #### Forfeiture clause in contract.

Many decisions have treated a clause of forfeiture as rendering the stipulated time of payment essential, and as therefore binding according to its letter, and have refused to give any relief. Sanborn v. Woodman, 5 Cush. 33; Remington v. Irwin, 14 Pa. 143; Jones v. Robbins, 29 Me. 351; Clark v. Lyons, 25 Ill. 105; McClartey v. Gokey, 81 Iowa, 606; Steele v. Branch, 40 Cal. 2; Rogan v. Walker, 1 Wis. 527; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 498; Wells v. Smith, 3 Edw. Ch. 78, 6 L. ed. 315, 7 Paige, 22, 4 L. ed. 43, 45; Edgerton v. Peckham, 11 Paige, 352, 5 L. ed. 159.

But the clause in an agreement providing that plaintiffs were to pay as herein provided, or forfeit the one hundred dollars this day paid, does not operate to make the day fixed essential. Austin v. Wacks, 30 Minn. 240; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 498; Edgerton v. Peckham, supra.

Where time is of the essence of the contract, the

3. Where the payment of the purchase money and the making of the deed are to occur simultaneously they are regarded as concurrent acts, which disable either party from putting an end to the contract without performance, or a valid offer to perform, on his part.
4. In a suit by a vendor for a rescission of a contract for the sale of real estate, on account of a failure to pay purchase money, the complaint must allege that he has tendered to the vendee a valid deed, conveying to him all the land, according to the terms of the agreement, and demanded performance on the part of the vendee.
5. Mere failure to pay the purchase money, according to terms of the contract, will not entitle vendor to have contract rescinded.
6. Where the vendor is prevented from complying with his contract by the wrongful act of the vendee in obtaining an outstanding title to a portion of the land, so far as that portion of the land is concerned, in a suit by vendor to rescind, the vendee is estopped from claiming that no tender of deed has been made.
7. When the vendee has paid part of the purchase money and given his notes for the balance, before the vendor can rescind a contract he must return or offer to return money paid, with legal interest, less reasonable rental value of premises if vendee has been in possession, and also all unpaid notes.
8. Where a controversy concerning the title to government land is still pending in and undetermined by the land department of the United States, the courts of this State will not interfere.
9. Where a vendee enters into possession of land, under a contract of purchase, he will not be permitted to obtain an outstanding title and assert it against his vendor, but such title will inure to the benefit of vendor.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Polk County dismissing his complaint in an action brought to cancel a contract for the sale of certain land and to enjoin its sale by the vendee. Affirmed.

Statement by Bean, J.:

This is a suit in equity to cancel a contract for the sale of land by plaintiff to defendant. For the purpose of this case it is sufficient to state that the complaint alleges that on the 18th day of February, 1880, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract for the sale of certain real estate therein described, and containing 860 acres. By the terms of said agreement, defendant was to pay the plaintiff the sum of $1,600 for said land, in accordance with the tenor of seven certain promissory notes of that date, therein set out, the last of which to become due and payable on the 13th of February, 1886. That in consideration of said notes, and the payment thereof by said defendant, according to their tenor, the plaintiff agreed to transfer to him, at the time of the last payment, all said lands in fee. That defendant entered into the possession of said lands, and has remained in possession ever since. That at the time of making the contract for the sale plaintiff only had a contract of purchase from the Oregon & California Railroad complainant may lose his right under the contract by not performing at the day. Bruce v. Tilson, 25 N. Y. 197.

Where the parties had made the payment at the day an essential part of the contract, the vendee, who had failed to make the payment at the time specified, was not entitled to a decree for a specific performance of the contract. Grigg v. Landis, 21 N. J. Eq. 505.

Where one contracts to sell real estate to which he at the time has no title, he cannot forfeit the contract for nonpayment while he is not in a position to perform on his part, so as to enable him to oust the purchaser from possession. Getty v. Peters (Mich.) 10 L. R. A. 485.

Incapacity to perform defeats the action.

The court will not direct specific performance where the party is unable to perform his contract. Martin v. Colby, 42 Hun. 1.

If the impossibility of performance exists from the beginning, as where defendant had no title to, interest in or authority over the particular land, etc., and no legal means of acquiring the title or authority, performance will not be decreed. Columbine v. Chichester, 2 Phill. Ch. 37; Hills v. Colman, 4 Jur. N. S. 350; Hallett v. Middleton, 1 Russ. 248; Pom. Spec. Perf. § 294.

An incapacity to perform a contract which did not exist when the contract was made may subsequently arise from the defendant's own act or default. Denton v. Stewart, 1 Cox, Ch. 258; Greenaway v. Adams, 12 Ves. Jr. 395; Ferguson v. Wilson, L. R. 2 Ch. 77; Helling v. Lumley, 3 De G. & J. 493; Gupton v. Gupton, 47 Mo. 37; Smith v. Kelley, 56 Me. 64.

So if a vendor, after having agreed to sell the land to plaintiff, sells it to a third party under such circumstances that the latter is not a bona fide purchaser without notice, specific performance can be enforced against such purchaser. Bird v. Hall, 80 Mich. 874; Cole v. Cole, 41 Md. 301; Snowman v. Harford, 57 Me. 397; Bryant v. Boose, 55 Ga. 428; Fullerton v. McCurdy, 4 Lans. 123; Haughwout v. Murphy, 23 N. J. Eq. 531; Gregg v. Hamilton, 13 Kan. 333; Johnson v. Bowden, 37 Tex. 621; Youell v. Allen, 18 Mich. 103.

If the purchaser is one bona fide and without notice, so that defendant has incapacitated himself from performance, equity, after getting jurisdiction of the case, may award the legal remedy of damages. Woodcock v. Bennet, 1 Cow. 711; Greenaway v. Adams, 12 Ves. Jr. 395.

Where an award of damages will not put the party in a situation as beneficial to him as if the agreements were specifically performed, equity will enforce the performance. Phyfe v. Wardell, 2 Edw. Ch. 47, 6 L. ed. 304; Richmond v. Dubuque & R. C. R. Co. 33 Iowa, 423; Blanchard v. Detroit, L. & L. M. R. Co. 31 Mich. 43; McGarvey v. Hall, 23 Cal. 140; Somerby v. Sutin, 118 Mass. 279; Bogan v. Daughdrill, 51 Ala. 512; Willard v. Taylor, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 557, 19 L. ed. 501.

The inability of vendor to make a good title will not authorize a court of equity to rescind the contract when the parties have an adequate remedy at law. Hepburn v. Dunlop, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 179, 4 L. ed. 65.

Materiality of time as an element.

Time of performance of a contract is always material when either of the parties chooses that it shall be. Dominick v. Michael, 4 Sandf. 426; Mitchell v. Wilson, 4 Edw. Ch. 697, 6 L. ed. 1023.

The time of performance becomes material where a day was fixed on which defendant was bound to give a deed of the land free from all incumbrances with full covenants of warranty, and

Company for 160 acres of the land, which he agreed to convey to defendant, but defendant knew the condition of his title, and accepted the contract with the understanding that plaintiff might and would perfect his title so that by the time the last payment became due he might be in a condition to transfer the legal title thereof to the defendant, according to his agreement. That about March 1, 1883, it was ascertained that there was some question as to whether the 160-acre tract of land was lands of the United States, subject to homestead entry, or whether the same, in fact and law, is within the grant of the Oregon & California Railroad Company. Upon such information coming to defendant, he thereupon filed an application in the proper land-office to enter the same as a homestead, at the same time assuring plaintiff that he made the application for the protection and benefit of plaintiff, and that he had expended for his use and benefit, in making such application, the sum of $13, which, at his request, plaintiff repaid to him. That afterwards, contriving to cheat, wrong and defraud plaintiff, he claimed and asserted that said application was made for his own use and benefit. That he has since made final proof of his continued residence and occupation, and a certificate for a patent for said land has been issued to him by the local land-officers. That at the time of defendant's application to make proof of his residence and occupation, plaintiff appeared, and interposed his objections thereto, and set forth the facts and reasons therefor, but, notwithstanding the claim of plaintiff, the certificate for the patent to said lands was issued to defendant. That plaintiff thereupon duly appealed to the land department at Washington, D. C., which appeal is still pending and undetermined. That defendant is threatening to sell and dispose of said 160 acres to innocent purchasers, and will, unless enjoined, make such a disposition thereof as will tend to greatly hinder the plaintiff in maintaining his legal rights concerning the same against the claim of defendant and his intended grantees. That defendant has failed to comply with the terms of said agreement of purchase on his part, or make any of the payments therein provided for, except the sum of $340, paid soon after the execution of said contract. That on the 1st day of October, 1883, the said defendant abandoned and repudiated his said contract with the plaintiff, and refused to pay the purchase money of the said lands, or any part thereof, and has since failed and refused to pay the same, or any part thereof, and the same is now wholly due and unpaid; and the said defendant further, in consummation of his fraudulent intentions and designs, has forbidden and prevented the said plaintiff from perfecting the title to the said 160 acres of land; and, but for the said wrongful act of the said defendant, the plaintiff would have perfected the same, and complied with the terms of said contract, according to the terms thereof, as hereinbefore stated. The prayer for relief in the complaint is: (1) that defendant be enjoined from disposing of the 160 acres of land during the pendency of the appeal before the interior department; (2) for an accounting of the rents and profits of the lands during the time defendant he was never in a condition to perform on his part owing to continued subjection of the land to mortgages and outstanding leases, he was prevented from availing himself of any delay on the plaintiff's part. *Jerome v. #### Time, when of the essence of the contract.

Time is of the essence of the contract when it is material that it should be performed at the time, or when the contract, by express stipulations, makes it of the essence, and releases the other party upon failure to comply within the time. *Grigg v. But it must affirmatively appear that the parties regarded time or place as an essential element in their agreement, or a court of equity will not so regard it. Secombe v. Steele, 61 U. #### Ordinarily not of the essence of the contract.

Time must be of the substance or essence of the agreement, otherwise it will generally in this respect be considered that the agreement should still be performed. Renwick v. Renwick, 1 Bradt. 237; Eaton v. Lyon, 3 Ves. Jr. 692; Pincke v. Curteis, 4 Bro. Ch. 329; Davis v. Hone, 2 Sob. & Lef. 347; Leannon v. Napper, Id. 684; *Maxwell v. In all ordinary cases equity treats the provision as to time of performance as formal rather than essential, and permits the party who has suffered the period to elapse to perform such acts after the prescribed date, and to compel a performance notwithstanding his own delay. *Hull v. Time is not of the essence of a contract unless the parties expressly so stipulate, or unless it follows by necessary implication from the nature of the property dealt with, or the avowed objects of the seller or purchaser. *Dynan v. A general demurrer to the complaint, being interposed, was sustained, and the complaint dismissed, from which decree this appeal was taken.

How made of the essence of the contract.

Time, although not ordinarily of the essence of a contract in equity, yet may be made so by clear manifestation of the intent of the parties in the contract itself, by subsequent notice from one party to the other, by laches in the party seeking to enforce it, or by a change in the value of the land, or other circumstances which would make a decree for the specific performance inequitable. Barnard v. Lee, 97 Mass. 32; Wells v. Smith, 2 Edw. Ch. 32, 6 L. ed. 317, 7 Paige, 22, 4 L. ed. 48; Bullock v. Adams, 20 N. J. Eq. 372; Morgan v. Bergen, 3 Neb. 214; *Moore v. Time will be held of the essence when, from the nature of the subject matter or the object of the parties, the time of performance was intended to be such. King v. Buckman, 20 N. J. Eq. 354; McKay v. Carrington, 1 McLean, 50; Holt v. Rogers, 18 U. S. 8 Pet. 420, 8 L. ed. 935; Young v. Rathbone, 36 N. J. Eq. 224; Bullock v. Adams, 20 N. J. Eq. 372.

Time of payment, if a substantial, and not merely formal, circumstance, enters into the essence of the contract, and must be observed. Hollingsworth v. Fry, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 345, 1 L. ed. 360.

It may be made of the essence of the contract by changes of the circumstances and special circumstances of hardship and loss (Crane v. Decamp, 21 N. J. Eq. 420), or by a new agreement extending the time (King v. Buckman, 20 N. J. Eq. 355); or it may be waived by the conduct of the party. Wiswall v. McGowan, 3 Barb. 290.

a title to the land, and until he was ready, willing and able to perform his part of the contract he had no standing in equity, either to have the contract rescinded or for performance.

2 Chitty, Cont. note 11, p. 1058; 8 Pom. Eq. 152; Powell v. Dayton, S. & G. R. R. Co. 12 Or. 458, 14 Or. 356.

Bean, J., delivered the opinion of the court: The grounds upon which it is sought to cancel the contract in this case are (1) the failure of defendant to pay the purchase price at the time provided in the contract, and (2) the conduct of defendant in attempting to secure a title from the United States for the 160 acres of land in his own name and in fraud of the rights of plaintiff. The first ground proceeds upon the theory that time is of the essence of the contract, and that when defendant failed or neglected to make the payments as he agreed to do plaintiff was entitled to rescind the contract. Time is of course an indispensable ingredient of every contract, but it is not ordinarily of the essence of the contract for the sale of real estate, unless made so by the express agreement of the parties, or by the nature of the contract itself, or of the circumstances under which it was made. When the vendor, by his contract to convey, has not affirmatively provided that time shall be of the essence of the contract, a court of equity will ordinarily infer that interest on the deferred payments would be a sufficient compensation for the delay. "Compensation" and not "forfeiture" is a favorite maxim with a court of equity. Knott v. Stephens, 5 Or. 285; Brook v. Hidy, 13 Ohio

So it was held to be waived by the vendee's giving the vendor time, after the day fixed for performance of a contract for sale of land, to perfect his title. Stevenson v. Polk, 71 Iowa, 373.

It may be made of the essence of the contract by express stipulation, or by implication. No particular form is necessary, but any clause will have the effect which clearly provides that the contract is to be null, if the fulfillment is not within the prescribed time. *Hudson v. So when a debt is divided into several payments and the parties contract that, upon the failure to make one when it becomes due, the whole amount shall become due and payable, the court is bound to give effect to it. *Pope v. Where the condition is that in case of default in the payment of any installment the whole principal sum shall become due and collectible at the option of the mortgagee, it is necessary for the St. 306; King v. Buckman, 20 N. J. Eq. 316.

In this case the agreement does not provide that time shall be of the essence of the contract, nor is there anything in the nature of the contract itself, or the surrounding circumstances, from which the court can infer that it was so intended by the parties at the time the contract was made. Although there is no stipulation in the contract that time shall be essential, nor anything in the nature or circumstances of the agreement to make it so, it could nevertheless have been made so by a tender of performance on the part of plaintiff and demand of payment. Knott v. Stephens, supra; 2 Warvelle, Vend. and P. 848.

As a general rule, a party who asks for the rescission of a contract for the sale of real estate must be himself without fault; and when, as in this case, the payment of the purchase money and the making or tender of the deed are to occur simultaneously, they are regarded as mutual and concurrent acts, which disable either party from putting an end to the contract, without performance or a valid offer to perform on his part, and, so far as the question of time is concerned, both parties, after the day provided for the consummation, may be considered equally in default, and neither can hold himself discharged from the obligation of complete performance, until he has tendered performance on his own side and demanded it on the other. Powell v. Dayton, 8 & G. B. Co. 14 Or. 356; Knott v. Stephens, 5 Or. 235; Rummington v. Kelley, 7 Ohio, pt. 2, p. 97.

When the vendor insists that the vendee is in default, to such an extent as to entitle him to have the contract rescinded, he must allege and prove that he has tendered to the vendee a deed conveying to him all the land according to the terms of the agreement, and demanded performance on the part of the vendee, and must have notified him that the contract would be rescinded unless purchase money was paid within a reasonable time. The mere failure to pay the purchase money according to the terms of the agreement will not be held a repudiation of the contract so as to authorize a suit by the vendor to have it rescinded. Gregg v. English, 38 Tex. 189; Johnson v. Jackson, 27 Miss. 498; 2 Warvelle, Vend. and P. 849, 880.

Ordinarily, in a contract of this character, the vendee is entitled to a deed conveying to him the entire land according to agreement, as soon as the purchase money is paid, and he is under no obligation to pay the money except on receipt of the deed. The obligation of the defendant to pay the purchase money is dependent on the duty of the plaintiff to convey the land, so far as to disable him from putting an end to the contract, without performance or a valid offer to perform on his part. Watson v. Wilson, 30 Miss. 576.

In this case plaintiff does not allege or claim that he ever offered to perform the contract on his part, and without such an allegation this complaint fails to state a cause of suit against the defendant for a rescission of the contract, nor is he, under such a complaint, entitled to a decree for specific performance. It was insisted on the argument that defendant had, by his conduct in relation to the 160 acres of supposed mortgagee to take his option and give notice thereof before suit brought in order to recover the whole principal sum. Basse v. Galleger, 7 Wis. 447.

Effect of possession by vendee.

Equity follows the law in holding that time does not run against one who is in possession in the exercise or assertion of a right, and hence a vendee who enters upon land and holds the land with vendor's consent and acquiescence will not be barred by the mere lapse of time, nor until he is put in default by a notice to surrender the premises or pay the price. Abbott v. L'Honniedieu, 10 W. Va. 712; DuBois v. Baum, 46 Pa. 537; Williams v. Starke, 2 B. Mon. 196; Ely v. McKay, 12 Allen, 323; Schmidt v. Livingston, 3 Edw. Ch. 213, 6 L. ed. 631.

So long as the purchaser of lands remains in possession under his deeds, he has no defense to an action for the purchase price. Kirts v. Peck, 118 N. Y. 231; Thorpe v. Keokuk Coal Co. 43 N. Y. 258; McConihe v. Fales, 10 Cent. Rep. 322, 108 N. Y. 404; Ryerson v. Willis, 31 N. Y. 277; Parkinson v. Sherman, 74 N. Y. 83.

A vendee remaining in possession under his purchase cannot set up an outstanding title in a third person which he has purchased. Greeno v. Munson, 9 Vt. 37; Larkin v. Montgomery Bank, 9 Port. (Ala.) 434; Bush v. Adams, 22 Fla. 193.

If he buys in an outstanding incumbrance he will not be permitted to set up an adverse title under it against his vendor, but the purchase inures to the benefit of the vendor's title, and the vendee can only abate the unpaid purchase money, or, in case he has paid this, may recover the amount he has expended in the purchase of the incumbrance by action on the covenant broken, or in assumpsit. The vendee cannot use the title or incumbrance purchased to the annoyance of him under whose title he entered. Equity will also lend aid for remuneration. Delavernne v. Norris, 7 Johns. 358; Stanard v. Eldridge, 16 Johns. 254; Stewart v. Drake, 9 N. J. L. 175; Davenport v. Bartlett, 9 Ala. 179; Hardeman v. Cowan, 10 Smedes & M. 436; Champlin v. Dotson, 13 Smedes & M. 553; Meadows v. Hopkins, Meigs, 181, 33 Am. Dec. 140; Fowler v. Cravens, 3 J. J. Marsh. 423; Morgan v. Boone, 4 T. B. Mon. 291; Kirkpatrick v. Miller, 50 Miss. 521, 522; Dyer v. Britton, 53 Miss. 270; Prescott v. Trueman, 4 Mass. 637; Norton v. Babcock, 3 Met. 510; Bush v. Adams, supra.

Relations of parties.

The vendor is regarded as trustee of the land for the purchaser, and the purchaser as the trustee of the purchase money. Boetwick v. Beach, 7 Cent. Rep. 637, 105 N. Y. 651; Ware v. Lippincott, (N. J.) 8 Cent. Rep. 573, citing Haughwout v. Murphy, 22 N. J. Eq. 544; Waterman, Spec. Perf. § 519.

Where an agreement is made to sell land, upon execution of notes for the price and the title bond, the vendor holds the legal title as trustee for the vendee, and the vendee is a trustee for the vendor as to the purchase money. Lewis v. Hawkins, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 119, 23 L. ed. 113; Boone v. Chiles, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 177, 9 L. ed. 338; Jennison v. Leonard, 33 U. S. 21 Wall. 302, 23 L. ed. 539, citing Swartwout v. Burr, 1 Barb. 469; Champion v. Brown, 6 Johns. Ch. 402, 2 L. ed. 164; 1 Story, Eq. § 739; 2 Story, Eq. § 1212; 1 Sugd. Vend. 175.

Execution of a contract for sale of real estate, with part payment thereon, is a transfer in equity of the title; the vendor has simply the naked title as trustee for the vendee, to be conveyed on his performance. Bissell v. Heyward, 93 U. S. 580, 24 L. ed. 673.

On sale of real estate by contract, the title remains in the vendor, and the possession passes to railroad land, rendered it impossible for plaintiff to obtain a title thereto, so that he could comply with his contract; and therefore was excused from tendering a deed to the land agreed to be conveyed, before bringing suit to rescind the contract. The complaint does perhaps show a sufficient excuse for not tendering a deed for the 160 acres. If plaintiff was prevented from complying with his contract by the wrongful acts of defendant, as far as this portion of the land is concerned, the defendant cannot be heard to say that no tender of deed in fee had been made; but there remain 200 acres to which plaintiff has a title, and he should have tendered a deed for that portion of the land he agreed to convey, and given defendant an opportunity to pay the purchase money before attempting to rescind the contract. The defendant may have been perfectly willing to have accepted a deed in fee for the 200 acres, and a release as to the remaining 160 acres, and to have paid the purchase money he agreed to pay; at least he should have been given an opportunity to do so, before bringing this suit. Plaintiff was bound to comply with the contract on his part by performing, or offering to perform, according to his engagements, except in so far as he was excused by reason of defendant's conduct or acts.

the vendee, and an equitable interest vests in the vendee to the extent of the payments made by him. Jennison v. Leonard, supra.

The vendee put into possession will not be permitted to buy in incumbrances, and set up an adverse title under them against his vendor. Champlin v. Dotson, 18 Smedes & M. 553, 58 Am. Dec. 104; Harper v. Reno, Freem. Ch. 323; Hardeman v. Cowan, 10 Smedes & M. 436.

But a vendee is not the trustee as to the possession of the property sold. He claims and holds it in his own right. Boone v. Chiles, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 177, 9 L. ed. 383. See Blight v. Rochester, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 535, 5 L. ed. 515.

Whatever puts an end to the equitable interest of the vendee—as notice, an agreement of the parties, a surrender, an abandonment—places the vendor where he was before the contract was made. Jennison v. Leonard, supra.

It does not alter the effect in such a case that the contract contains no clause of re-entry, or that the vendor has sought to enforce payment of the amounts which became due to him, before the surrender and abandonment. Ibid.

If the contract stipulates for possession by the vendee, or the vendor puts him in possession, he holds as a licensee, and cannot dispute the title of the vendor. *Burnett v. Caldwell, 16 U. S. 9 Wall. 290, 19 L. ed. 712; Galloway v. Finley, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 264, 9 L. ed. 1079; Bush v. Marshall, 47 U. S. 6 How. 234, 12 L. ed. 440; Peters v. Bowman, 98 U. S. 56, 25 L. ed. 91, citing *Mumford v. Whitney, 15 Wend. 380; Dolittle v. Eddy, 7 Barb. 73; Watkins v. Holman, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 54, 10 L. ed. 385; Blight v. Rochester, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 535, 5 L. ed. 515; Whiteide v. Jackson, 1 Wend. 418; Jackson v. Moncrief, 5 Wend. 26; Jackson v. Stewart, 6 Johns. 84; Hamilton v. Taylor, Litt. Sel. Cas. 444; Co. Litt. 82b.

If vendee has no right to take possession, but enters, he holds as a licensee or tenant at will, and cannot dispute the vendor's title. Lewis v. Hawkins, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 119, 23 L. ed. 118; Sufferin v. Townsend, 9 Johns. 35; Dolittle v. Eddy, 7 Barb. 75.

Where a vendee has bought up a better title than that of the vendor, equity treats him, in reforming the contract, as a trustee for the vendor. Galloway 12 L. R. A.

There is yet another reason why plaintiff cannot have this contract rescinded. It appears from the complaint that soon after making the contract defendant paid $340 of the purchase price. Before plaintiff can abandon the contract, and treat it at an end, he must refund or offer to refund the money paid in part performance of it, with legal accrued interest. It is a general rule that in order to disaffirm a contract and entitle a party to the right resulting therefrom, the rescinding party must put the other in statu quo. He must account to the other for any money paid in part performance of the contract. Knott v. Stephens, 5 Or. 235; Johnson v. Jackson, 27 Miss. 493; 2 Warvelle, Vend. and P. 381; Thomas v. Beaton, 25 Tex. Supp. 318.

Plaintiff does not offer to account for the money paid him by defendant in part performance of this contract, but seeks not only to rescind the contract and retain this money, but to charge defendant with the rents and profits of the land, during the time he has been in possession thereof, in addition. It would certainly be unjust to permit plaintiff, after having received a part of the purchase money, to put an end to the contract, upon the failure of defendant to pay the remainder, without offering to account to him for the money already paid.

Rights and remedies of parties must be mutual.

It is a general principle of equity to grant a decree of specific performance only where there is a mutuality of obligation, and when the remedy is mutual. United States v. Noe, 64 U. S. 23 How. 312, 16 L. ed. 403; Brashier v. Gratz, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 523, 5 L. ed. 322; Dorsey v. Packwood, 53 U. S. 12 How. 123, 13 L. ed. 321; Bronson v. Cahill, 4 McLean, 21; German v. Machin, 6 Paige, 233, 5 L. ed. 900; Justice v. Lang, 43 N. Y. 509.

The remedial right which gives jurisdiction over suit for a specific performance, if it exists at all, must be mutual, and each party must be able to enforce the remedy against the other. Old Colony B. Corp. v. Evans, 6 Gray, 35; Benedict v. Lynch, 1 Johns. Ch. 370, 1 L. ed. 175; Schroepfel v. Hopper, 40 Barb. 423; Jones v. Newhall, 115 Mass. 244; German v. Machin, supra.

When a contract is incapable of being enforced against one party, that party is equally incapable of enforcing it specifically against the other. Rutland Marble Co. v. Ripley, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 339, 19 L. ed. 955; Butman v. Porter, 100 Mass. 397; Sullings v. Sullings, 9 Allen, 234; DeCordova v. Smith, 9 Tex. 144, 58 Am. Dec. 139.

The remedial right must be mutual; each party must be able to enforce the remedy against the other. *Rindge v. Baker, 37 N. Y. 319, 15 Am. Rep. 433; Adderley v. Mutuality in the contract is essential to a decree for a specific execution of the contract. Bronson v. Cahill, 4 McLean, 21; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. 443; Benedict v. Lynch, 1 Johns. Ch. 370, 1 L. ed. 175; Parkhurst v. Van Cortlandt, 1 Johns. Ch. 233, 1 L. ed. 141.

A contract, to be enforceable in equity, must, in general, be mutual in its obligations and its remedy. (Duvall v. Myers, 3 Md. Ch. 401; Beard v.

He who seeks the aid of a court of equity must himself do equity. If plaintiff had tendered a deed such as the contract required, he should, in addition, have returned the notes given by defendant, for the purchase money, and the amount paid him by defendant, with legal interest, or at least have offered to return them, before he could be permitted to rescind. This seems to be the universal rule. The party against whom its rescission is sought must be placed in statu quo. Murphy v. Lockwood, 21 Ill. 611.

In a case of this kind where the vendee has been allowed to enter into possession of the land, and receive the rents and profits, the vendor would probably be entitled to have the reasonable value thereof deducted from any money paid on the contract by defendant, and would only be required to refund to defendant the balance, if any, remaining after deducting such rental value. What has already been said is sufficient to show that plaintiff does not allege facts sufficient to entitle him to maintain a suit to rescind the contract of sale to the defendant; but it is insisted that under the allegations of the complaint the defendant should be enjoined from selling the 160 acres, for which he holds a certificate for a patent from the United States.

The controversy between plaintiff and defendant concerning the legal title to this land is still pending before the land department of the United States, and therefore this court cannot now undertake to inquire into the question as to who has the better right to this land under the provisions of the Land Laws of the government. The land department having acquired jurisdiction, it must first be allowed to proceed to final determination of the case. Moore v. Fields, 1 Or. 818.

But defendant having entered into the possession of this land under a contract of purchase, will not be permitted to obtain an outstanding title and assert it against the plaintiff. It was expressly understood at the time the contract for the sale of this land was made that the title was unsettled, and that plaintiff would take such steps as might be necessary, in order to perfect the same, so as to comply with his agreement with defendant. With this understanding, defendant was allowed to go into possession of the land, and having done so, neither equity nor good conscience will permit him, by taking advantage of such possession, to obtain the title from the general government in his own name for his own use and benefit. So that, if it should finally be determined by the land department that the land is not within

Where the legal title cannot be conveyed to the vendee by the vendor, and the vendee must resort to a court of equity to establish his title, notwithstanding a conveyance of all the rights of the vendor to him, the court will not compel him to pay the purchase money. Bank of Columbia v. Hagner, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 455, 7 L. ed. 219; Hepburn v. Auld, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 232, 3 L. ed. 96.

Rights and remedies of vendor.

Ordinarily, a vendor, in the recovery of pecuniary damages, has an adequate remedy at law; but he has a choice of remedies. He may resort either to a court of law or a court of equity. Crory v. Smith, 2 N. Y. 62; Pincke v. Curteis, 4 Bro. Ch. 339.

The real test in an equitable action is this: If it be brought for damages for breach of contract, it is a case at law; if it be brought for money, by way of performance of the contract, it is a case in equity. Rindge v. Baker, 57 N. Y. 219.

If the seller is able to make a good title he is required to make a conveyance to entitle him to sue for the consideration. See note to Townshend v. Goodfellow (Minn.) 3 L. R. A. 739.

But it is sufficient if he can make the title at the time of this decree. Id. 740.

If a contract fixes the time for payment agreed upon, but fixes no time for doing that which is the condition of the payment, performance of the condition is not a condition precedent to an action. See Donovan v. Judson, 6 L. R. A. 591, 81 Cal. 334.

Whether in such action a tender of the deed is a prerequisite of the right to sue, see note to Donovan v. Judson, supra.

The legal effect of a covenant to sell is that the land shall be conveyed by a deed from one who has a good title, or full power to convey a good title. This is a condition precedent, without the literal performance of which the purchasers are not bound to pay their money. Turner v. Ogden, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 450, 17 L. ed. 303.

At law, to entitle the vendor to recover the purchase money, he must, in his declaration, aver performance of the contract on his part, or an offer to perform, at the day specified for the performance. Bank of Columbia v. Hagner, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 455, 7 L. ed. 219. See Davis v. Hone, 2 Sch. & Lef. 347; Lennon v. Napper, 2 Sch. & Lef. 684.

An innocent grantor induced to convey in aid of the fraud of a third person is entitled to reconveyance. Bugbee's App. (Pa.) 1 Cent. Rep. 113.

Rights and remedies of vendee.

When the contract price is fully paid, the entire title is equitably vested in the vendee, and he may compel a conveyance of the legal title by the vendor, his heirs or assigns. Jennison v. Leonard, 28 U. S. 21 Wall. 302, 22 L. ed. 539.

Where time is not of the essence of the contract the purchaser is not entitled to a rescission of the contract for inability of vendor to make a good title, the vendor's title being subsequently perfected. Smith v. Canaler, 33 Ky. 367.

Nor will the contract be rescinded where it is obvious that the parties cannot be restored to the status occupied at its execution, in consequence of disposition since made of the property. Stanton v. Hughes, 97 N. C. 318, citing McDowell v. Simms, Bush. Eq. (N. C.) 130; Pettijohn v. Williams, 2 Jones, Eq. 302.

Nor is the purchaser entitled to a rescission and recovery of the purchase money, if the vendor is ready to perform. Hathaway v. Hoge (Pa.) 1 Cent. Rep. 339. See note to Tarkington v. Purvis (Ind.) 9 L. R. A. 607.

It would not prevent him from afterward rescinding the contract, on discovery of the fraud practiced on him by vendor in executing a void deed. Nothe v. Nomer, 3 New Eng. Rep. 656, 54 Conn. 323.

A purchaser in possession under a deed with the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Company, and a patent issued to defendant, the title will inure to the benefit of plaintiff, and the defendant would only be entitled to deduct from the purchase money the actual cost of obtaining such title from the government. It is an established rule of equity "that if a vendee buys up a better title than that of the vendor, and the vendor was guilty of no fraud, he can only be compelled to refund to the vendee the amount of money paid for the better title. Equity treats the purchaser as a trustee for his vendor, because he holds under him, and acts done to perfect the title of the former when in possession of the land inure to the benefit of him under whom the possession was obtained, and through whom a knowledge of a defect of title was obtained. The vendor and vendee stand in the relation of landlord and tenant. The vendee cannot disavow the vendor's title." Bush v. Marshall, 47 U. S. 6 How. 284, 12 L. ed. 440; Galloway v. Finley, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 294, 9 L. ed. 1091.

At the time of the contract for the sale of this land by plaintiff to defendant, plaintiff was in the possession thereof under a contract of purchase from the Oregon & California Railroad Company, and, acting in good faith, had made valuable and permanent improvements thereon to the amount and value as alleged in the complaint of the sum of $1,800. Relying on defendant's agreement to purchase the same, he surrendered the possession to him, and now he, having so obtained the possession, seeks, contrary to good faith and fair dealing, to obtain the title in his own name, and thereby to overreach his vendor, who was using every endeavor to secure the title for the use and benefit of defendant in fulfillment of his own contract to convey. This a court of equity will not permit him to do, but whatever title he may obtain will inure to the benefit of plaintiff. But, while such is the law applicable to the facts of this case, plaintiff has failed to allege in his complaint, as we have already shown, sufficient to entitle him to a decree for a specific performance of his contract with defendant, or for a cancellation of the same, and, until he does so, the court is powerless to aid him, and the decrees of the court below is affirmed.

Where the contract provides for the vendee taking possession, his remedy, in case the title of the vendor fails, or he is unable to make a conveyance as stipulated in the contract, is to rescind, or offer to rescind, the contract, to restore the possession, and recover back the money paid. Gates v. McLean, 70 Cal. 43.

If the vendee elects to retain the property, and not to rescind, he can do so only on condition that he pay the purchase money and interest, according to the contract, and receive such title as the vendor is able to give. Ibid., citing Taft v. Kessel, 16 Wis. 273; McIndoe v. Morman, 26 Wis. 586.

Taking possession of property before conveyance does not deprive vendee of the right to relinquish the property, if the vendor could not make a title or neglected to do so. Bank of Columbia v. Hagner, 28 U. S. 1 Pet. 455, 7 L. ed. 219.

Where the vendor had put it out of his power, by deeding away the land to another, to perform on his part, the vendee may treat the contract as broken and recover back the money paid by him. Weaver v. Acheson, 3 West. Rep. 764, 65 Mich. 235.

If a vendee purchases a better title, there being no fraud, he can compel the vendor to refund only the amount paid for the better title. Bush v. Marshall, 47 U. S. 6 How. 284, 12 L. ed. 440.

A vendee in possession under a contract of purchase or a deed with covenants cannot reclaim the purchase money already paid, to be held as security for the completion or protection of his title. Refeld v. Woodfolk, 68 U. S. 23 How. 318, 16 L. ed. 370.

A purchaser of real property has no remedy on the ground of failure of title if he has taken no covenants to secure the title. See notes to Kansas City Land Co. v. Hill (Tenn.) 5 L. R. A. 45.

Relief is obtainable only in cases of fraud. Refeld v. Woodfolk, 68 U. S. 23 How. 318, 16 L. ed. 370. See Patton v. Taylor, 48 U. S. 7 How. 122, 12 L. ed. 637.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

CONSOLIDATED COAL CO. of St. Louis,

Appt.,

v.

James D. BAKER, Treasurer of St. Clair County.

(.....Ill.....)

1. The one objecting to a tax has the burden of showing facts which will avoid it, or which will establish its illegality, if it has been returned in conformity to the statutory requirements. The collecting officers cannot be compelled, in the first instance, to furnish evidence of its validity.
2. The right to coal and minerals in their natural state can be severed from the ownership of the land by a contract so as to subject to taxation the property thereby acquired.
3. The separation for purposes of taxation of coal or other minerals from the ownership of the land is not prohibited by Rev. Stat., chap. 120, requiring real property containing minerals to be valued at the price for which it would sell including the minerals.

(January 24, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the County Court for St. Clair County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding to collect certain taxes alleged to be delinquent. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles W. Thomas for appellant.

Mr. M. W. Schaefer for appellee.

Shope, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an application to the County Court of St. Clair County by the County Treasurer of that county for judgment for delinquent taxes for the year 1889. The assessor of the township in which the property was situate and assessable had returned his assessment, conformably to law, of five tracts of land, assessing one of said tracts in the name of Louis Fuchs; one in the name of Francois Louis; one in the names of F. Schmissarun and L. De Kum; one in the name of Casper Bertelsman; and one in the name of Marsh Ward; and had also returned an assessment in the name of appellant "for the coal under" the same lands,—upon which several assessments taxes had been extended by the proper officer. It appears that the taxes extended upon the assessment of the lands had been paid, but the taxes upon the assessment of the coal underlying the same had become delinquent, and judgment was asked for in this proceeding. Appellant appeared in the county court, and filed the following objections to the rendition of judgment, to wit: "(1) The coal is not assessable separately from the land in which it lies; and (2) the taxes have been paid on the land in which the coal lies, and that the land was assessed without excepting the coal." The court, upon consideration of the evidence, overruled the objections, and rendered judgment for said taxes, and the Consolidated Coal Company of St. Louis prosecutes this appeal.

It is insisted (1) that the burden was upon the collector to show that the owners of the land had in some way sold and conveyed the coal underlying their lands respectively, and, having failed to do so, the objections should have been sustained. We are unable to concur in this view. The assessment was introduced in evidence, and the assessor called as a witness, who testified that, in making the assessment, he decreased the value placed upon the land by the amount he placed upon the coal, and that "the superintendent of objector's mines, on the premises in which the coal is situated, told me the number of acres in each tract yet unmined, and I followed his statement" in making the assessment. The collector's return of the delinquent list, with statutory notice and proof of publication, prima facie entitles the collector to judgment for the tax returned as delinquent. The presumption is that the assessor, and other officers charged with the levy and collection of taxes, have done their duty, and have not made an illegal assessment or returned an illegal tax delinquent. We have repeatedly held that the burden of showing such matters as would avoid the tax or establish its illegality is upon the person objecting thereto. Moore v. People, 123 Ill. 645, 12 West. Rep. 769; Durham v. People, 97 Ill. 414; Pike v. People, 84 Ill. 80; Mia v. People, 81 Ill. 118; Chiniquy v. People, 78 Ill. 570; Brackett v. People, 115 Ill. 29, 1 West. Rep. 616.

When the return of the collector is in conformity with the Statute, the presumption of the regularity of the assessment and the validity of the tax is indulged until facts are shown that impeach its legality. Here the tax was returned delinquent against the coal underlying the several tracts named, and the presumption must obtain that it was properly so assessed and returned until the contrary is made to appear. It was peculiarly within the power of the objector to show the fact; and if, for any reason not appearing on the face of the return of the collector, the tax was improperly assessed, or was invalid, the burden was upon the objector to establish it.

It is insisted, however, that under the Revenue Laws of this State, coal and other substances which, in their natural state and situs are part of the realty, cannot be so severed from the ownership of the land, or the land itself, as to become separately taxable, and that therefore the assessment made upon the coal underlying these lands is void; that the land having been assessed to the several owners thereof, and the taxes thereon duly paid, there was no further liability because of any substance upon or forming part of the land. The 4th section of the Revenue Act (chap. 120, Rev. Stat.) provides: "Real property shall be valued as follows: First. Each tract or lot of real property shall be valued at its fair cash value, estimated at the price it would bring at a fair, voluntary sale. Second. Taxable leasehold estates shall be valued at such a price as they would bring at a fair, voluntary sale for cash. Fourth. In valuing any real property on which there is coal or other mine, or stone or other quarry, the same shall be valued at such a price as such property, including the mine or quarry, would sell at a fair, voluntary sale for cash." And it is insisted that therefore, for the purposes of taxation, there can be no severance of the mine from the land, but, as before said, the value of the mine must be included in the valuation of the land, however separated by contract, or severally held and owned. Section 1 of article 9 of the Constitution of this State provides "that the General Assembly shall provide such revenue as may be needful by levying a tax by valuation, so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her or its property." Construing the provisions of the Revenue Law quoted, and in the light of this provision of the Constitution, it would seem that the question was whether appellant had, or could have held, by deed of conveyance or lease, such an interest in the coal underlying these lands as would be property and assessable as land. By the Statute of New York the term "land," as used in the law relating to property liable to taxation, etc., is, by statute, to be construed "to include the land itself, including land and water; all buildings and other articles erected upon or affixed to the same; all trees and underwood growing thereon; and all mines, minerals, quarries and fossils in and under the same."

In Smyth v. Mayor, 68 N. Y. 552, it was held that, under the definition of land thus given, "one may be taxed as owner of the fee of the land, and another for the trees, buildings and other structures thereon, and the minerals and quarries therein." And it was there held that a pier built upon the land of the city by the appellant, Smith, was real estate, within the meaning of the statute, and taxable as such, although built upon the land of another.

So, in People v. Cassity, 46 N. Y. 46, when the question was as to the right to tax the track of a street railway, placed in the streets of a city, as land, it was held to be land, within the Statute. The ground was then taken that it was not real estate, but the court, by Folger, J., said: "The Statute means, for its purpose, to make two general divisions of property—one all lands, another all personal property; and then, to be more definite, it declares that by 'land' is meant the 'earth' itself, and also all buildings and other articles erected upon or affixed to the same. We do not think that, when buildings or other articles are erected upon or affixed to the earth, they are not, in the view of the Statute, land, unless held and owned in connection with the ownership of the fee in the soil. We are of opinion that the Statute means that such an interest in real estate as will protect the erection or affixing thereon, and the possession of the fixtures, will bring such building and fixtures within the term 'lands,' and hold them to assessment as the land of whomsoever has that interest in the real estate, and owns and possesses the buildings and fixtures." See also People v. Taxes & Assessments Commrs. 10 Hun, 207; People v. Brooklyn Board of Assessors, 98 N. Y. 308. In the latter case it was expressly ruled that it was competent for the parties by contract to regulate their several interests in the real estate, so that one might own the buildings and the other the fee, and holding that the buildings, in such case, were properly assessed as land. We do not deem it necessary to extend this opinion by citation from other courts. Our Statute provides that in valuing lands on which there is coal or other mine, or stone or other quarry, the price and value of such mine or quarry shall be included. This necessarily means a valuation of the mine or quarry, and, if there is no division of ownership, it will all properly be assessed with the fee. It is, however, a matter of common knowledge, that the coal underlying lands are conveyed by deed or other instrument so as to vest the coal, with right of mining the same, in another than the owner of the fee. Ordinarily, perhaps, there is an absolute conveyance of the coal or other mineral, with a lease of sufficient of the surface for shafts, etc., at which to deliver the coal from the mine, or it may be mined by entries from other adjacent lands without entering upon the surface of the particular tract of land upon which the coal is situated. The grant is more than a mere license to enter and mine the coal. It is a conveyance of the coal itself as it lies impacted between the strata of stone, slate or clay, in a state of nature. The title passes to it as property. It is true its value must be added to the valuation of the land, but it by no means follows that it must be assessed with it. The parties have created two distinct properties in the same land, one holding one property right in the land, and the other a distinctively separate property interest therein. The Statute, as before said, when read in view of the constitutional provision quoted, would regard the assessment to be made in the name of the persons or corporations holding such property interests in the land. True, the total assessment must equal the value of the land augmented by the value of the coal or mine, but the assessment of each should be made separately, according to the several holdings, to the end that each "shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her or its property." The coal thus conveyed or reserved by the grantors of the land is not personal property, and cannot be until it is severed. By the conveyance of it, an interest in the land itself passes to the grantee the ownership of portions of the constituents of the land, and falls within the designation of real estate for the purposes of taxation. This question was before us in Major v. Parvey (Ill.) 84 N. E. Rep. 973, and we there held that where the grantor had reserved from the conveyance the coal, etc., underlying the land conveyed, it was properly assessed for taxation separately. This holding is criticized by counsel, and we have been thereby led into the foregoing discussion. In that case, after quoting the provision of the Constitution hereinbefore quoted, we said: "We think it clear that the mining right to the coal and minerals reserved in the deeds and contracts must be regarded as property, within the meaning of the foregoing provision." That case is, as we have seen, supported by abundant authority, and, upon careful reconsideration of the question, we are fully satisfied with the principle then announced.

The judgment of the County Court in this case was fully warranted, and must be affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

William J. HAYES

v.

TOWN OF HYDE PARK.

(.....Mass.....)

1. A telegraph wire across a highway, hanging so low as to cause an injury to a traveler, is a defect for which the town is liable if it had or ought to have had notice thereof.
2. The co-operation of the act of a traveler, who is not guilty of negligence or any wrongful act, with a defect in a highway in causing an injury to another traveler, will not relieve the town from liability.

(May 18, 1891.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Norfolk County (Lathrop, J.) made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligently permitting a defect to remain in a public highway, in which a verdict was directed to be returned in favor of defendant. Sustained.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Meers, Elisha Greenhood and F. W. Murphy, for plaintiff:

That the condition of things immediately created by the falling wires, and to which immediate condition plaintiff's accident was attributable, was due to the careless indifference of the town officers, could be fairly inferred from the evidence.

Day v. Milford, 5 Allen, 96; Drake v. Lowell, 18 Met. 292; West v. Lynn, 110 Mass. 514.

The wires were a defect in or upon the highway from the time that they were liable to fall by the ordinary action of the elements.

Day v. Milford, supra; Hewison v. New Haven, 84 Conn. 142.

The bare fact that the street was wide and smooth enough for travel does not satisfy the Statute.

Munson v. Derby, 87 Conn. 298.

Anything in the condition of a highway which renders it unsafe or inconvenient or is a menace to ordinary travel is a defect.

Barber v. Roxbury, 11 Allen, 818, 820.

The Town was bound to see that the highway was safe and convenient for travel thereon, in the light of such conditions as are natural and likely to occur.

Lindsey v. Danville, 45 Vt. 72.

A town has the power and it is its duty to see that there shall be no structure or physical thing upon or over the highway, and that no object which is not an incident of a building, shall be in, upon, near or over the traveled part of the highway, which obstructs or hinders one in the use of the highway, or which from its position or character or lack of support is likely to become such an obstruction, hindrance or nuisance to travel; and any such structure or object causing damage may be a defect.

NOTE.—Contributory negligence; effect of co-operating causes of injury to the person. See Smithwick v. Hall, post, —, 12 L. R. A.

Day v. Milford, supra; Post v. Boston, 1 New Eng. Rep. 549, 141 Mass. 189; Hewison v. New Haven and Drake v. Lowell, supra; Talbot v. Taunton, 1 New Eng. Rep. 615, 140 Mass. 552; Jones v. New Haven, 84 Conn. 10; West v. Lynn, supra.

It is of no consequence that the immediate physical condition arose from natural and general causes over which the Town had no control, such as storms, accident or gradual change, if the Town was already chargeable with permitting to exist such a previous condition as, with the aid of such causes, would be likely to produce such immediate condition.

The innocent shifting of the position of the wires by Rogers was no more the cause or one of the efficient causes of the accident, than would have been the force of gravitation or the force of the elements working horizontally or perpendicularly.

Salisbury v. Herchenroder, 106 Mass. 458; Day v. Milford, 5 Allen, 98; Drake v. Lowell, 18 Met. 292; Dickinson v. Boyle, 17 Pick. 78; Woodward v. Aborn, 85 Me. 271; *Barnard v. The fact that an accident such as is natural, and reasonably to be anticipated and guarded against by the Town, in some way contributed to the injury, is no defense to the Town, and does not, as a matter of law, prove that the defect was not the direct, sufficient and sole cause of the injury.

The negligence of the Town was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's accident.

Flagg v. Hudson, 2 New Eng. Rep. 652, 142 Mass. 280; Stickney v. Maidstone, 80 Vt. 738.

Assuming that Rogers' act had something to do with the accident, and that it was competent for the jury to find that it was an unintentional act, not attributable to his carelessness, it was an accident which was not an efficient, independent cause, conspiring with the defect, but, on the contrary, was a natural and ordinary incident of the defect itself, behind which the Town cannot shield itself.

A defect, or a want of repair, is either inert matter in incumbering the highway upon or over it, or structural defect endangering public travel.

Davis v. Bangor, 43 Me. 523.

Such a state of repair in a road as would free a town from exposure to indictment and conviction would protect it also against a claim for damages for an injury sustained by an individual while traveling thereon.

A plaintiff cannot recover unless the defect is the sole cause of the injury. Where this follows from a defect united with some distinct, efficient, concurring cause, without which it would not have happened, unless as suggested by Chief Justice Shaw in Marble v. Worcester, 4 Gray, 395, such concurring cause is pure accident, the plaintiff cannot recover.

Roswell v. Lowell, 7 Gray, 100; Kidder v. Dunstable, Id. 104; Lyons v. Brookline, 119 Mass. 491.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by a defect in the highway. The alleged defect was a telegraph wire which sloped down from a house to which it was fastened and lay across the highway. Whether the wire was broken before the time of the accident, or whether it still was attached on the other side of the way to another house five or six hundred feet away from the one first mentioned, is not very clear and is not material. The only support which there had been between these two points was a bracket on a pole (in the road as we understand) and this had been gone for about a week. There was evidence that the wire was down within a foot of the ground the night before. The wire was caught in the wheels of a wagon which was coming toward the plaintiff and he was hurt in bending back in his seat in order to get under the wire as it reached him. He saw the wire approaching when it was fifty feet ahead and called to the other driver, but the other driver paid no attention and might have been found not to have heard the plaintiff. In view of the possible expectations of the plaintiff that the other man was to stop, and his testimony as to the shortness of the time, the speed, his inability to turn out or to change his seat, etc., we cannot say that the jury might not have been warranted in finding that he used due care.

It is argued that the wire was not a defect. But it was fixed at one end, at least, and the jury might have found that it came down to the road in such a way as permanently to obstruct travel so that it resembled "a barrier fixed or stretched across the way" which was admitted to be a defect, rather than the rope of a derrick being moved by third persons, for which the city was held not to be liable in Barber v. Roxbury, 11 Allen, 318, 320; French v. Brunswick, 21 Me. 29. The jury might have inferred from the length of time that the wire had been down that the Town had or ought to have had notice of the defect.

The main argument for the defendant is that whether the wire was a defect or not it was not the sole cause of the injury, but that the conduct of the driver of the other wagon concurred in bringing about the plaintiff's hurt. If in the opinion of the jury the other driver was negligent as towards the plaintiff, and thus had a hand in causing the injury, no doubt the plaintiff cannot recover. Kidder v. Dunstable, 7 Gray, 104; Pratt v. Weymouth, 147 Mass. 245, 252, 6 New Eng. Rep. 671. But the jury might have found that the other driver was not negligent, and indeed that until it was too late he was wholly unaware of his entanglement, or that there was a wire in the road at all. If so his co-operation stood on no different footing from the force of gravitation.

A town is not exonerated because other causes co-operate with the defect; if it were it never would be liable. Human causes stand no differently from any others merely as such. The limit of the statutory liability of towns is only the strictest form of the limit of the liability of wrong-doers, to an extent not yet, perhaps, exactly determined. Wrong-doers are presumed not to contemplate wrong-doing by others unless they are shown in fact and actually to have contemplated it. Therefore generally they are not liable if another wrong-doer intervenes between their act and the result. Tasker v. Stanley (Mass.) Jan. 12, 1891. But the mere fact that another human being intervenes is not enough. Elmer v. Fessenden, 151 Mass. 359, 362, 363, 5 L. R. A. 724; Corney v. Shanty, 107 Mass. 568, 581; Carter v. Towne, 98 Mass. 567; McDonald v. Snelling, 14 Allen, 290, 296. His intervention is important, not qua cause, but qua wrong-doer. In the case of towns sued for a defect in the highway the wrongful acts of the third person need not intervene subsequently. It is enough that it co-operates with the defect at the moment; but the principle is the same. It is because the act is wrongful (including under this head negligence), not because it is a concurring cause, that the defendant escapes. If the act which concurs with the defect in producing the result complained of is innocent and is of a kind which the defendant is bound to expect and to provide for, such, for instance, as another man's driving upon the road, the jury may find against the town as well as when a particular state of the weather is a concurrent cause. Flagg v. Hudson, 142 Mass. 280, 2 New Eng. Rep. 652. It can make no difference whether the defect brings the plaintiff into contact with the innocent vehicle, as in Flagg v. Hudson, or the innocent vehicle brings the plaintiff into contact with the defect, as the jury might find to have been the fact here. The act of the third party is equally necessary to the result, and is equally innocent in the two cases. We will add that there is no question before us of remoteness in the sense discussed in Marble v. Worcester, 4 Gray, 395, and McDonald v. Snelling, 14 Allen, 290, 292.

The other objection urged to the plaintiff's right to go the jury was that it did not appear that notice was given to the Town, as required by statute, within thirty days of the accident.

Pub. Stat. chap. 52, § 19; Stat. 1883, chap. 36; Stat. 1888, chap. 114. By the plaintiff's testimony the accident happened on February 7, 1889. The notice gave the same date. The town clerk produced the notice and testified solely, as he said, from inspection of a memorandum upon it, that it was received on February 6, 1889. Another witness testified that he heard of the accident through the notice during the last month of his official year, which ended on March 4, 1889. If the jury believed that the accident happened on the seventh, they necessarily would have found that the indorsement of the sixth, as the day when the notice was received, was a mistake, but that the notice was received before March 4.

We are of opinion that the learned judge erred in directing a verdict for the defendant.

(....N. Y.....)

In assessing that part of a telegraph "line" in any town for taxes under Laws 1883, chap. 653, providing for its assessment in the same manner as lands of residents, its value as part of a telegraph line in operation is not to be considered, especially since a tax on the business and franchises of the company is provided for by another statute, but the property actually in the town, such as the wires, poles and interest and easement in the land occupied, is to be assessed at its full value.

(April 14, 1891.)

APPEALS by relator from orders of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming orders of the Special Term for Rensselaer County quashing three separate writs of certiorari by which relator sought to review the assessment of its property for taxation by the Assessor of the City of Troy for the years 1885, 1886 and 1887. Reversed as to assessment for 1886. Affirmed as to the others.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wager Swayne, Willard Brown, Charles W. Wells and Edwin A. King for appellant.

Mr. William J. Roche for respondents.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We have lately held in People v. Adams (N. Y.), 96 N. E. Rep. 746, that a person under the circumstances in which this relator stood, failing to appear before the board of assessors on what is known as "grievance day," is guilty of such laches as to warrant the court in refusing to grant him any relief in the premises. It sufficiently appears in this proceeding that the relator did thus fail to appear in the years 1885 and 1887. This leaves only the assessment of 1886 open for inspection and review. In the affidavit made on the part of the relator to procure the certiorari to review the assessment for that year it is alleged that the assessment is erroneous and illegal by reason of overvaluation, and is unequal, because made at a higher proportionate valuation than other real property on the roll. It is also alleged that the actual value of the property of the relator within the limits of the City of Troy, and all fixtures connected therewith, does not exceed $4,000. The writ of certiorari was duly issued, and the defendants made return thereto, and the issues were referred to a referee to take testimony, after which the matter came on for a hearing before the court at special term, which made various findings of fact, and upon the merits quashed the writ. Upon appeal to the general term that court affirmed the order of the special term, and from the affirmance the relator has appealed here. The court at special term found the value of the taxable property of the defendant listed on the assessment roll of Troy for the year 1886 was at least $12,000. If there be any evidence to support the finding, this court is concluded. But if it appear that in coming to that conclusion the courts below have included improper and illegal elements as a basis for valuation, then an error of law has been made which is reviewable here. Upon the hearing before the referee to take testimony, the counsel for the defendants, under the objection of the relator's counsel, proved that the receipts of the relator's Troy office were about $30,000. At another time, before the court, the counsel for the defendants objected to proof as to the cost of setting the ordinary sized pole in Troy, because, as counsel said, the property of the Company was real estate, and must be valued as a whole. He also objected to evidence of the cost of freight in transporting relator's poles to Troy, because it was not competent to reduce the value of the real estate in such manner. He made the same objection to proof of the wages of employes engaged in setting the poles. The eleventh finding of fact by the court is that, "except as appears from the assessment rolls in said city for the year 1886, there is no sufficient proof of the actual value of the relator's telegraph property as it was then established and in operation in the City of Troy as part of an extensive system for transmitting information and news by telegraph." In his opinion at special term the learned judge said: "In ascertaining the value of the real estate in question it must be regarded as a part of a whole, of a complete telegraph line in operation. Its value, not as poles and wire simply, but for telegraph purposes, and its position, with its connections and its productive capacity, are important, if not controlling, considerations." At the general term, in the opinion delivered, the learned judge says upon this point: "The cost of construction was by no means controlling as to the value of the relator's property in Troy. That was only an integral part of a great system which extended over the entire State, and by itself might be of little value, as compared with its value as a part of the entire system." And in his brief before this court the learned counsel for the defendants, in justifying the valuation placed upon the relator's property by the Assessors and the court at special term, uses this language: "In ascertaining the actual value of such property, the Assessors had the right, and it was their duty, to look beyond the cost of specific material at wholesale prices, and the cost of the labor, and to estimate such property, not as an isolated piece of land, but in connection with its position, its incidents and the business and profits to be derived therefrom." It is thus seen that it has been assumed as a fact by the courts below, and it is conceded by counsel, that the defendants pursued the method above mentioned of determining the value of the property of the relator in the City of Troy for purposes of local taxation. The question now to be decided is whether this method or system is valid.

For the purpose of fixing the manner of assessing what the Legislature denominated "certain real estate of telegraph companies" it passed in the year 1881 an Act (chap. 597 of the Laws of that year), by which it was provided that telegraph companies in the State should on a certain day in each year make a sworn statement showing the total length of their lines in each county, with the cost of construction and equipment thereof, and the assessors within each county were to assess for purposes of taxation such proportion of the cost of construction as the length of the lines in the district of the assessors bore to the total length of the lines in the county. The Legislature at the same session passed the Act (chap. 861) taxing the corporations therein named in the manner stated. Among such corporations are telegraph companies. The tax is declared to be one upon the corporate franchise or business of the corporation, is payable annually, and is computed upon the par value of the capital stock, the percentage of tax depending upon the amount of dividends paid by the company, or, if no dividends, or a less amount than 6 per cent is paid, then the tax is to be at the rate named in the Statute upon a certain valuation of the capital stock. In addition to this tax and by the same Act, the companies named therein are to pay to the state treasurer, as a further tax on their corporate franchises or business in the State, a certain tax upon the gross earnings in the State for the business therein. These two Acts of the Legislature should be construed together as in pari materia, and in them is provided a system for the taxation of the property of telegraph companies, their franchises and business (exclusive of real estate, in the ordinary acceptation of that term, which might be owned by them). This system continued until 1886, when the Legislature passed the Act providing for the assessment of telegraph, telephone and electric-light lines, and known as chapter 659 of the Laws of that year. (This Act should also be construed in connection with the Act of 1881, chap. 861.) The important sections are 1 and 2, and they read as follows: "Section 1. The portion of any telegraph, telephone or electric-light line in any town or ward in this State shall be assessed in such town or ward to the owner or person or corporation or association in control thereof, in the manner provided by law for the assessment of lands of resident owners; and the same proceedings may be had upon such assessment, and for the collection of any tax levied thereon. Sec. 2. The word 'lines' shall include the interest in the land on which the poles stand, the right or license to erect such poles on land, all poles, arms, insulators, wires and apparatus, instruments, or other thing connected with or used as a part of such line in such town or ward, and belonging either to the owner of such line or the person, corporation or association in control thereof." This Act superseded that of 1881, chap. 597. Of course the land—that is, a house and lot, or a vacant lot of ground owned by a telegraph company—is assessed to it in the same way it would be to any other owner. The Act of 1886 does not allude to real estate or land strictly so called. It refers to the telegraph "line" in the town or ward, and it is to be assessed in the manner provided by law for the assessment of lands of resident owners. It being thus necessary to assess the lines as land, in the manner provided by law for the assessment of lands of resident owners, and the Statute providing that the word "lines" must include among other items of value the interest in the land on which the poles stand, and the right or license to erect such poles on land, it becomes necessary to inquire, What is the manner provided by law for the assessment of the lands of resident owners? The Revised Statutes provide the manner. 1 Rev. Stat. 889, title 2, art. 1. The resident is to be assessed in the town or ward of his residence when the assessment is made for the lands owned by him within such town or ward, and the full value of such land is to be set down by the assessors in a separate column in their assessment roll. The assessors are to estimate and assess the land at its full and true value as they would appraise the same in payment of a just debt due from a solvent debtor. This is the manner provided by law for the assessment of lands of a resident owner.

What is the full and true value of this property of a telegraph company, and how is it to be arrived at? To enact that certain things shall be regarded as and included in the term "land" or "real estate," does not in the least alter the essential nature or characteristics of the things which are to be thus called. To say that the word "land," when used in the law with reference to taxation, shall include not only the land itself, but all telegraph lines, wires, poles, arms, insulators, apparatus and instruments, does not change their essential nature. They remain articles which are manufactured, and which can be duplicated and supplied to any required extent at a certain known cost of production. The company may be able to procure the instruments, poles or wires at a less cost than others, owing to their special advantages; but anyone can procure such articles in all the quantities desired. The supply has always kept pace with the demand. The value of the poles, arms, insulators, apparatus, instruments and wires would therefore consist of the cost of production, meaning by that term to include the value of the labor necessary to set them up and place them ready for use. If any of these articles were patented, and the company did not own the patent, the price paid therefor would be their value, where they could be furnished indefinitely as desired. To call these things "land" does not make them land in their nature. As they are capable of indefinite reproduction at a known cost, that cost must, in the nature of the subject, be their value for the purpose of the Statute. And when that cost is shown by evidence which is uncontradicted, and in no way doubtful, or in fact doubted, then such cost must be deemed the value of those separate articles. But this is not all that shall be taxed under the provisions of the Statute. The interest in the land on which the poles stand, and the right or license to erect such poles on land, are also to be included in the assessment of the property of the company. What is the nature of the interest in the land on which the poles stand? We have held in American Rapid Tele. Co. v. Hess (N. Y.), 36 N. E. Rep. 919 (lately decided), that a telegraph company organized under the Act of 1848, and obtaining from it the right to construct its lines of telegraph upon the public streets or highways, acquired no absolute interest in the highway or the land, and that it was subject to the police power of the State, wielded through its municipal agencies, which could direct the lines to be taken down and placed in subways provided for them. This interest in the land in a street is in reality nothing more than a license granted by the State. In the language of the Act, it is an authority to construct lines along and upon the public roads and highways. This license may also be revoked by legislative enactment. It was so stated in the case heretofore cited (American Rapid Tele. Co. v. Hess), and we feel strengthened in our views in that case by further reflection. Therefore the value of the interest in the land in which a pole is placed in a public street by a telegraph company must be arrived at in consideration of the important fact that such interest is a mere license, and revocable at the pleasure of the Legislature. It must also be observed that any other telegraph company organized under the general law may avail itself of the same license to enter upon the public streets. So there is really no title whatever in the Company to the land thus used, and its only interest is subject to extinguishment by the Legislature at any time. The cost which the Company incurred in obtaining the interest in the land in a public street would in this case, taking into consideration all the Acts providing for the taxation of the Company, be a correct criterion by which to judge of its value. As to the value of the right or license to erect the poles on land, also spoken of in the Act, much the same reasoning is to be adopted. This right or license is one which any company may avail itself of if incorporated under the general Act, and it costs nothing. If the company, in placing its poles on the land of any individual, shall have paid anything to the owner of the land for such use, or incurred any contractual liability to him, the amount paid, or the amount included in such liability, would be good evidence of the value of the right. There might be other elements entering into that question, but in this case all the poles seem to have been placed exclusively in the public streets. If the Company should pay an abutting owner on a public street or highway for the use of the interest, or any part of it, which the owner may have in such street or highway, such payment would be part of the cost of obtaining the interest in the land, and the right to therein erect the poles. Taking the cost of the production of those articles, which are in their nature personal property, and capable of infinite production, as above described, and adding to that cost the value of the interest in the land on which the poles stand and the value of the right to erect such poles on the land, upon the principles above indicated, and we have the total elements entering into the full and true value of the property of the Company subject to taxation under the Act of 1886 above cited. In the assessment for taxation under that Act the property is not to be regarded as a part of a whole, nor as a complete telegraph line in operation. Its value for telegraph purposes, and its position, with its connections, and its productive capacity, are not considerations entering into the value of the property under the Act last named. These considerations are foreign to its purpose. They largely enter into the question of the value of the business and the franchises of the Company; and the value of such business and franchises is to be assessed under the Act of 1881, already quoted. If it were not for that Act and its provisions for assessing the value of the business and franchises of telegraph companies for the purpose of taxation, it may be that courts would strive to give a wider meaning, if possible, to the language of the Act of 1886, for the purpose of reaching these subjects of taxation. But when they are already taxed under a separate Act it cannot be supposed that the Legislature intended to tax them again proportionately in every tax locality in the State.

It is obvious that the learned courts below, in arriving at their conclusions as to the proper facts to consider in deciding the question of the value of the property of the relator, viewed it as if such property were real estate in the narrow acceptance of the term, such as a piece of ground on which a house was erected on rails laid, and which was owned by the relator in fee. The authorities cited in support of their proposition relate to railroads or bridges forming part of real estate owned in fee by the companies. In such cases it is held that in determining the value of such real estate its earning capacity is a most important feature, and that in assessing the real estate of a railroad it is to be assessed, not as an isolated piece of property, but in connection with its position, its incidents and the business and profits to be derived therefrom. Its productive capacity and its earnings are all to be considered, and the cost of the whole road is to be taken into account. People v. Barker, 48 N.Y. 77; People v. Hicks, 40 Hun, 600; People v. Weaver, 84 Hun, 822.

In this case, under the Statute of 1886, as to telegraph companies, different language is used, and a different kind of property is intended to be reached for assessment. The poles, wires, instruments, arms, insulators and apparatus are included in the word "lines" in the Statute, and they are to be assessed in the manner provided by law for assessing the lands of residents. The Statute points out how that is to be done, and the property is to be assessed at its full value, together with the interest in the land on which the poles stand, and the right to erect such poles on the land. This interest and this right differ wholly in character and nature from the real estate owned in fee by the railroad or bridge company, and the rules for the valuation of that species of property are by no means appropriate for the purpose of arriving at the full value of the property of the Telegraph Company, as enumerated in the Statute of 1886. Most of this property, it is seen, is personal property, and it is called "land," although the poles are placed in streets which do not belong to the Company, and in which the Company has, as we have seen, no interest of a strictly legal nature. The railroad or the bridge company, on the contrary, does own the fee of the real estate upon which it places its superstructure of rails or bridge, and the question arises, What is the value of this real estate owned by the Company upon which this superstructure has been placed, and which is used for railroad or bridge purposes? That question involves almost necessarily the inquiry as to the profitableness of the superstructure which has been placed thereon, and which forms part and parcel of the real estate upon which it is laid; and this can only be answered by regarding the real estate as part of a whole portion of real estate devoted to the railroad or bridge purpose. The land—the portion of the earth on which the rails rest—is owned by the Company, and the Company to that extent has a monopoly. This land cannot be increased or reproduced. The structure, having been placed on it, becomes a part of it, and it must all be appraised at its full value as an integral part of a whole or completed instrument created for the purpose of realizing pecuniary profit. The cost of each particular portion of real estate, while one element to be considered for the purpose of determining the question of profits, cannot, in the nature of the property, be regarded as the one important consideration for the purpose of arriving at its full value for taxation. Without continuing the comparison further, it seems to me there is a clear, radical and important difference in the very nature of the properties to be taxed, and which should lead to a different rule in the assessment of what is in fact real estate or earth in the one case and personal property in the other, although called "land."

A question as to the appealability of this order as not involving $500 has been made by counsel for defendants. The counsel calls it a "judgment of the general term." It is in truth an order, and it has been so held to be by us. People v. Asten, 100 N.Y. 600, 1 Cent. Rep. 770. We think the appeal is provided for by the Act which gives the remedy by certiorari, and hence the point made by the counsel for the defendants is not well taken.

The orders of the General and Special Terms, so far as they relate to the assessment of 1886, should be reversed, and that assessment should be set aside, with directions to the assessors to reassess the property of the corporation for the year 1886, in conformity with the principles laid down in this opinion; and the orders of the general term, so far as they relate to the assessments of 1886 and 1887, should be affirmed; no costs to either party on any appeal.

All concur, except Finch and Gray, JJ., absent.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Buchanan County disallowing his claim against the estate of Madison S. Farris, deceased. Affirmed.

Statement by Sherwood, J.:

Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 2384, provides that all contracts, which by common law are joint only, shall be construed to be joint and several; and sections 188, 209, that all demands against the estate of any deceased person shall be classified and paid as follows: " (5) all demands legally exhibited within one year; (6) all demands thus exhibited after the end of one year, and within two years."

*An opinion was handed down in this case on March 22, 1890, leading to a reversal of the judgment below. A rehearing was subsequently granted and the court finally reached the conclusion announced in the opinion given herewith. [Rep.]

This cause originated in the Probate Court of Buchanan County, from whose judgment plaintiff appealed to the circuit court, where the cause was tried on the following agreed statement of facts: "That during the whole of the year 1882, and thereafter, up to the time of the death of Madison S. Farris, the said Madison S. Farris and Michael Farris were partners, doing business in the City of Saint Joseph and Platte County, Mo., under the firm name of M. S. Farris & Co. That during the time they were so in partnership, to wit, on the 1st day of February, 1884, said firm borrowed from plaintiff, for use in their business as such partners, the sum of $10,000 and gave their note in their firm name therefor, payable to plaintiff one day after date, which note is on file with the transcript from the Probate Court of Buchanan County, sent up in this case. That on said note there was paid, September 4, 1884, $3,075.88, and on July 1, 1885, $1,284.70, which said payments were made by Michael Farris, as administrator of the estate of M. S. Farris & Co., and as dividends on claims allowed by the probate court. Said Michael Farris, as surviving partner of said firm, was appointed and qualified as administrator of said partnership estate within one year before January 30, 1884, and the balance due on said note, no payments having been then made, was duly presented and allowed by the Probate Court of Buchanan County, Mo., against said partnership estate. That John Farris was duly appointed and qualified as administrator of the individual estate of Madison S. Farris by said probate court, and within one year after the grant of letters of administration on said individual estate this said note was presented for allowance against said individual estate, subject to the dividend so paid. That said John Farris has already paid, of individual claims allowed against said individual estate, within said first year of his administration, other than the one in controversy, nearly all the money realized from the assets of said estate, and there is not sufficient of said assets to pay, in addition, on the claim in contest, a per cent thereof equal to the per cent already paid on said other individual claims so allowed. That the individual estate is not sufficient to pay more than fifty cents on the dollar of the individual claims allowed within the first year against said individual estate, exclusive of the note or claim in contest in this suit. That the partnership assets have been about exhausted, and will not pay more than fifty per cent on partnership demands. The partnership estate of said M. S. Farris & Co. is not sufficient to pay more than fifty per cent of the claims allowed against said partnership estate. That this claimant has received his full pro rata of the assets of said partnership estate, the assets of said partnership estate being fully exhausted. That said Madison S. Farris died on the—— day of——, 1884."

This was all the evidence introduced or offered in the case on either side. The note mentioned in the agreed statement of facts was not read in evidence, nor is a copy of it preserved in the bill of exceptions. There were no instructions or declarations of law asked or given. The court, on the agreed statement of facts, allowed plaintiff's claim against the individual estate of Madison S. Farris, deceased, but, finding it to be a partnership debt of M. S. Farris & Co., allowed it subject to the payment in full, first, of the individual debts theretofore allowed and proved in the probate court against the individual estate of said deceased, and rendered its judgment accordingly. The case was tried at the January Term, 1886, of the circuit court, and at that term motions for a new trial and in arrest were filed by the plaintiff, overruled by the court and the case appealed to this court.

Messrs. James W. Boyd and A. D. Kirk for appellant.

Mr. B. R. Vineyard, for respondent:

The estate of a partnership must be settled, in case of dissolution by death, entirely on equitable principles, and they would require that the claims of the several creditors and those of the joint creditors should be kept entirely distinct, each having its separate fund, and passing over to the other only in case of a surplus. Upon such dissolution, the assets are placed in the custody of the law for distribution.

The Statute of this State (§ 658) requiring all joint contracts to be construed as joint and several, and making provision (§ 8467) for a suit against anyone liable, or his administrator, without the necessity of uniting with him as defendants the other joint contractors, was intended only to affect the mode of procedure, "and does not affect the law of contracts as it existed prior to its enactment."

Sherwood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Touching the principle involved in this litigation, Chancellor Kent remarks: "The joint creditors have the primary claim upon the joint fund, in the distribution of the assets of bankrupt or insolvent partners, and the partnership debts are to be settled before any division of the funds takes place. So far as the partnership property has been acquired by means of partnership debts, those debts have, in equity, a priority of claim to be discharged; and the separate creditors are only entitled in equity to seek payment from the surplus of the joint fund after satisfaction of the joint debts. The equity of the rule, on the other hand, equally requires that the joint creditors should only look to the surplus of the separate estates of the partners after payment of the separate debts. It was a principle of the Roman law, and it has been acknowledged in the equity jurisprudence of Spain, England and the United States, that partnership debts must be paid out of the partnership estate, and private and separate debts out of the private and separate estate of the individual partner. If the partnership creditors cannot obtain payment out of the partnership estate, they cannot, in equity, resort to the private and separate estate, until private and separate creditors are satisfied; nor have the creditors of the individual partners any claim upon the partnership property until all the partnership creditors are satisfied. The basis of the general rule is that the funds are to be liable on which the credit was given."

3 Kent, Com. pp. 64, 65. Judge Story announces the same rule. Story, Partn. Bennett's ed. §§ 363, 365, 366, 377, 382. It is well-settled law, as shown by the text-writers already mentioned, and others cited by counsel for defendant, that partnership creditors have a primary and exclusive claim upon the partnership assets of bankrupt or insolvent partners, when the same are administered and distributed. From this admitted right sprang the corresponding exclusive right of individual creditors to the satisfaction of their debts out of the separate property of the individual partners, and, until such satisfaction of such primary claim in either case, neither class of creditors is entitled to any share of the fund thus primarily devoted to the satisfaction of its own special indebtedness, the rule being, and the plain equity being, that each estate must pay its own creditors. The great current of authority follows in this direction, and is recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States, (Murrill v. Neill, 49 U. S. 8 How. 414, 12 L. ed. 1135), and in a large majority of our sister States, as well as by the text-writers. They are collated in the brief of defendant's counsel. A different rule was announced in England during Lord Thurlow's time, but afterwards the ancient rule was restored, as declared by his successor, Lord Loughborough, in Ex parte Elton, 8 Ves. Jr. 239. This is the generally prevalent rule in this country, as already stated. This rule is distinctly and with emphasis recognized and asserted by this court in Phelps v. McNeely, 66 Mo. 554, where the contest was between a creditor of the firm and an individual creditor as to which one was entitled to primary satisfaction of his indebtedness out of the partnership fund; and it was held that the partnership creditor was thus entitled, that his preference was not impaired by the dissolution of the partnership, nor by the fact that a deed of trust on the firm assets had been given by the purchasing partners to secure his indebtedness to his individual creditor, and that, as against the rights of the firm creditor, such deed was a nullity. This ruling, though standing alone, would be decisive of this cause; for the priority of a firm creditor to be satisfied out of the firm property would not be lost by reason of the dissolution of the partnership, or perish by reason of the death of one member of the firm. Our statutes looking to the classification of demands against the estate of a deceased member of a partnership, and the distribution of his estate, have no effect whatever on such priority. They were not intended to have any such effect. The well-settled equities in such cases are not to be thwarted or overthrown by mere methods of procedure such as those statutes authorize. This point has frequently been thus ruled in States possessed of statutes similar to our own. Rodgers v. Meranda, 7 Ohio St. loc. cit. 192; Irby v. Graham, 46 Miss. 425; Smith v. Mallory, 24 Ala. 628. A different rule was at first announced in Pennsylvania by a divided court in Bell v. Newman, 5 Serg. & R. 91; but the views of Judge Gibson, as expressed in that case, finally prevailed. Black's App. 44 Pa. 503. See also Level v. Farris, 24 Mo. App. 461, where the subject is exhaustively discussed by Phillips, J., and the authorities ably reviewed.

Nor is the position here taken in any manner affected by our Statute requiring all joint contracts to be construed as joint and several, and making provision for suit against any one or more of those liable. This was the equity rule upon the occurrence of the death of a partner long before the enactment of the Statute. 3 Kent, Com. 64.

Statutes of that nature confer no additional rights on the creditors of a partnership, nor upon individual creditors. Nor do they affect or vary the equitable priorities of the partnership creditors. 2 Bates, Partn. 828, and cases cited. Indeed, they contain not the slightest tendency or intimation that way.

The case of Shackelford v. Clark, 78 Mo. 491, is not opposed to the views here announced, when rightly understood. Martin, C., says expressly: "No principle in the law of partnership is better settled than that the creditors of a partnership have priority over the creditors of an individual member thereof in respect to the funds of the partnership." But that was a case where there were no partnership assets at all, and no dissolution of the partnership in consequence of the death of one of the partners. The parties to the contract were all alive, and parties to that suit. Besides, there was but one fund in that case, and no occasion arose to discuss the priorities of different persons to different funds, as in the case at bar. Such a right as is now being considered did not and could not arise in that case, and all remarks concerning it are but obiter. It is only where the dissolution of the partnership occurs by reason of the death of a partner or the bankruptcy of the firm that the lien of the partnership creditors can arise. Story says: "The joint creditors of the partnership, while all the partners are living and solvent, can enforce no claim against the joint effects or the separate effects of the partners, except by a common action at law. It is only in cases where there is a dissolution by the death or bankruptcy of one partner that the right of the joint creditors can attach, as a quasi lien upon the partnership effects, as a derivative subordinate right, under and through the lien and equity of the partners." Story, Partn. § 861. When there is no joint fund and no solvent partner, this makes an exception to the rule just mentioned. Id. § 878; 24 Ala. supra, loc. cit. 686, and cases cited. These considerations mark the wide difference between the present case and the one in 78 Mo., on which the plaintiff so confidently relies. The case of Eaton v. Walsh, 42 Mo. 272, has no bearing whatever on this case.

This reasoning and these authorities result in an affirmance of the judgment, and it is so ordered.

All concur, but Barclay, J., who dissents.

v.

St. PAUL & DULUTH R. CO., Appt.

(....Minn....)

1. The general rule in actions in tort is that the damages recoverable are those resulting directly from the wrongful act, whether they could or could not have been foreseen or contemplated by the wrong-doer as the probable result of the act done.
2. The direct or proximate consequences of a wrongful act are those which occur without any intervening cause; and where an efficient adequate cause for the injuries has been found, it must be considered as the true cause, unless another, not incident to it, but independent of it, is shown to have intervened.
3. The question as to what is the direct or proximate cause of an injury is ordinarily, not one of science or of legal knowledge, but of fact, for a jury to determine, in view of the accompanying circumstances.
4. Where the injuries complained of were caused immediately by the act of the servant in walking from the point to which he had been transported and put at work by the master, to a place where he could obtain necessary and proper shelter and protection from the elements, the master cannot be relieved from liability, in case it appears that the servant's act in so walking was apparently rendered necessary by the master's negligent act, and was not, in itself, negligent.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

To plaintiff's complaint herein the defendant corporation interposed a demurrer, upon the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Upon the argument of this appeal defendant contended that its negligence in the premises was insufficiently pleaded; that the injury complained of, provided the same could be said to have been the result of defendant's act, was not proximate, but was too remote a consequence to be chargeable to it; and, further, that from the allegations of the complaint it was manifest that plaintiff himself was guilty of contributory negligence. Very little need be said on any of these points, for none are well taken. The complaint contains much that is superfluous, but in respect to negligence it avers the defendant's duty to have been to furnish transportation to plaintiff, a car-repairer in its employ, from the wrecked caboose, which he had been sent out to repair by the foreman, back to St. Paul, when he had completed his work, and that it wrongfully, unlawfully and negligently failed and omitted so to do, or to furnish plaintiff with transportation to any other place where shelter or food could be obtained, and that by reason of such negligent failure and omission plaintiff was compelled to and did walk to the Village of White Bear, a distance of nine miles, in the night-time, in extremely cold and dangerous weather, that being the nearest point at which the necessary shelter and food could be had; that placing reliance upon defendant's performance of its duty towards plaintiff when he had completed his work, by furnishing transportation back to St. Paul from the place on its line of road where he had been taken to repair the caboose, plaintiff was wholly unprepared with means for properly sheltering or clothing himself. It was also averred that the facts and circumstances with reference to the location of the caboose, the inclemency of the weather, the distance to shelter or food, and that plaintiff, by reason of his reliance upon being transported back to St. Paul when through with his work, had not provided himself with proper clothing for such weather, were then well known to the defendant. The negligence of the defendant might have been specified with greater certainty, but from an inspection of the pleading it appears that defendant is charged with having unnecessarily and unreasonably placed its servant, the plaintiff, in serious danger, from which injury resulted, by carelessly and negligently omitting to perform a duty immediately connected with his work, on the performance of which he had a right to and did rely. With full knowledge of the situation as to weather and the locality, consequently of the danger to be apprehended, it neglected and abandoned the plaintiff under circumstances which he alleges resulted in personal injury to him. It had no more right to unnecessarily and unreasonably leave him in a dangerous place, to expose him to an unnecessary and unreasonable risk from the elements, by failing to furnish transportation from the place where he had been put at work, when that work was completed, it being its duty so to do, according to the complaint, than it had to unnecessarily and unreasonably expose him to risks and dangers while he was at work,—such risks and dangers as were discoverable by the use of ordinary precaution and diligence. The defendant should have been reasonably diligent, and could not, without incurring liability, desert the plaintiff in the manner and under the circumstances set forth in the complaint.

The important question in this case, however, is whether, from the complaint, it appears that defendant is liable for the injuries which resulted from plaintiff's efforts to obtain shelter and food on the occasion referred to; the former, as before stated, arguing that, as alleged, they are too remote, and are not the proximate results of its act. It is averred that, by reason of the unavoidable exposure of the plaintiff, he was made sick, contracted rheumatism, has ever since suffered great pain and agony, and has been permanently injured. It must not be forgotten that the gravamen of the action is the negligence and carelessness of the defendant in leaving plaintiff at a place where he could not procure either shelter or food. It is an action in tort, and not for a breach of contract. It is the negligence of the defendant which is complained of, and not the breach of a contract to return the plaintiff to St. Paul when he had performed his labor. It was, of course, essential that the plaintiff's relation with the defendant be made to appear, for, unless he was a servant to whom the defendant owed a duty, there could arise no liability by reason of its neglect to perform that duty. The relation of master and servant first having been shown to exist, the law fixes the duty of the former towards the latter, and a violation of this duty is a wrong, not a breach of the contract. This, then, is an action in which the wrong-doer is liable for the natural and probable consequences of its negligent act or omission; the general rules which limit the damages in actions of tort being, in many respects, different from those in actions on contracts. The injury must be the direct result of the misconduct attributed, and the general rule in respect to damages is that whoever commits a trespass or other wrongful act is liable for all the direct injury resulting therefrom, although such resulting injury could not have been contemplated as a probable result of the act done. 1 Sedgw. Dam. 180, note, and cases cited; Clifford v. Denver, S. P. & P. R. Co. 9 Colo. 393.

He who commits a trespass must be held to contemplate all the damages which may legitimately flow from his illegal act, whether he may have foreseen them or not; and, so far as it is plainly traceable, he must make compensation for the wrong. The damages cannot be considered too remote if, according to the usual experience of mankind, injurious results ought to have been apprehended. It is not necessary that the injury in the precise form in which it, in fact, resulted, should have been foreseen. It is enough that it now appears to have been a natural and probable consequence. Hill v. Winor, 118 Mass. 251. The question is whether the negligent act complained of—leaving the plaintiff in the open country in the night-time, in extremely cold and dangerous weather, a long distance from shelter or food—was the direct cause of the injuries mentioned in the complaint, or whether it was a remote cause, for which an action will not lie, and it must be taken for granted that the walk of nine miles and incident exposure brought about the alleged sickness, pain and disability. There was no intervening independent cause of the injury, for all of the acts done by the plaintiff, his effort to seek protection from the inclement and dangerous weather, were legitimate, and compelled by defendant's failure to reconvey him to the city. Had he remained at the caboose, and lost his hands, or his feet, or perhaps his life, by freezing, no doubt could exist of the defendant's liability. It must not be permitted to escape the consequences of its wrong because the injuries were received in an effort to avoid the threatened danger, or because they differ in form or seriousness from those which might have resulted had the plaintiff made no such effort. An efficient, adequate cause being found for the injuries received by plaintiff, it must be considered as the true cause, unless another, not incident to it, but independent of it, is shown to have intervened between it and the result. This is the substance of very clear statements of the law found in Kellogg v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 26 Wis. 228, and in Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 489, 24 L. ed. 256.

And upon the point now under consideration we fail to distinguish between the case at bar and Brown v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 54 Wis. 842, an action brought to recover for like damages said to have been caused by directing passengers to alight from a train at a place about three miles distant from their destination. At all events, the question as to what was the proximate cause of a plaintiff's injuries is usually one to be determined by a jury. As was said in Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, supra, the true rule is that what is the proximate cause of an injury is ordinarily for a jury. It is not a question of science or legal knowledge. It is to be determined as a fact, in view of the circumstances attending it.

Finally, the defendant insists that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, because, from the complaint, it appears that he was wholly unprepared with clothing sufficient for the occasion, and because he left the shelter of the caboose when he undertook his journey upon foot to the Village of White Bear. The plaintiff, undoubtedly, went prepared with such clothing as he would ordinarily and naturally need for the occasion, had the defendant performed its alleged duty, and this was all that was required of him. He was not obliged to anticipate the defendant's negligence or omission, and prepare for it, nor does it follow that, because there was a caboose at the place where he worked, it afforded him adequate and proper shelter for the night. If this was the fact, it can quite properly be shown as a defense upon the trial of the case. But the complaint negatives such a conclusion.

An ornamental structure proper in itself, placed in a public street by the proper authorities, for public use or enjoyment, although it extends upward instead of downward, and although it may not leave the entire street open to the public, if there is ample room left for public travel and convenience, will not be declared a nuisance on the application of the abutting owner of the fee, nor will the said owner be entitled to compensation as for a new and additional servitude.

Tompkins v. Hodgson, 2 Hun, 146, 4 Thomp. & C. 485.

The streets of a populous city or village may be appropriated to other purposes than a mere place of passage; they may be used and appropriated for any public use which is consistent and in harmony with their use as a public highway.

It is not essential that the act be specially authorized; it is sufficient if it be within the general scope of the powers conferred upon the municipality.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant owns a lot abutting upon a public street in the City of Aurora, on which she erected a dwelling-house, in which she and her husband, with their family, reside. The street has been improved, and has long been in general use. Years ago the owner of the lot now owned by the appellant dug and walled a well in the street in front of the lot, and this he did for his private benefit. The City had no interest and took no part in the work. In time the old well was abandoned, but another was dug by an owner of the lot for his own convenience. In April, 1887, the City of Aurora, without any legal proceedings and without the consent of the appellant, who had then become the owner of the lot, caused a platform to be constructed around the mouth of the well, and a pump to be placed in it. The appellant now asserts that the well constitutes a nuisance; that the City has no right to maintain a well in the street; that in doing so it has invaded her rights as an abutting owner; and she seeks an injunction prohibiting the City from maintaining the well.

It is undoubtedly the law that the abutter has a private property right in the street distinct from that of the public, of which he cannot be deprived without compensation. Common Council of Indianapolis v. Croas, 7 Ind. 9; Haynes v. Thomas, Id. 88; State v. Berdette, 78 Ind. 185, and cases cited; Rensselaer v. Leopold, 106 Ind. 29, 3 West. Rep. 874; Terre Haute & L. R. Co. v. Bissell, 108 Ind. 113, 6 West. Rep. 253; Lafayette v. Nagle, 113 Ind. 425, 12 West. Rep. 637; Kincaid v. Indianapolis Nat. Gas Co. 124 Ind. 578, 8 L. R. A. 602; 12 L. R. A.

Porter v. Midland R. Co. 125 Ind. 476. See also authorities collected in note, Elliott, Roads and Streets, p. 528.

This established principle leads to the doctrine that the street cannot be diverted from the use to which it was dedicated, and that an additional burden cannot be laid upon the property, without lawful authority, and after compensation has been paid or tendered. This much is clear. But an urban servitude is very comprehensive. It is always much more comprehensive than a suburban one. Kincaid v. Indianapolis Nat. Gas Co. supra.

The immediate question which arises is whether the urban servitude is broad enough to vest in the municipality the right to maintain a well in the street. The rights of a municipality, vested in it as the owner of an urban servitude, authorize it to use a street for many other purposes than that of travel. It is true that its primary character is that of a thoroughfare upon which citizens have a free right to pass and repass, and it is also true that its character as a street cannot be entirely destroyed without compensation to those injured by its destruction. See authorities cited in notes, pages 662, 663, Elliott, Roads and Streets. But, while this is true, it is also true that the use of streets is not confined to that of travel. Pipes for water and for gas may be laid in them, drinking fountains and hydrants may be placed in them, and cisterns may be dug in them. West v. Bancroft, 33 Vt. 367; Barter v. Com. 8 Feur. & W. 259; Branson v. Philadelphia, 47 Pa. 329; Cincinnati v. Penny, 21 Ohio St. 499; 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 690. See authorities collected in notes, Elliott, Roads and Streets, pp. 305, 306.

We can see no reason why a well originally dug by a lotowner may not become a public convenience for citizens and travelers, and as such maintained by a municipal corporation. The principle asserted by the authorities to which we have referred clearly authorizes the conclusion that a well originally dug in a street by a lotowner may be taken charge of by the corporate authorities, and made fit for convenient public use. Town pumps have long been in existence—long before Hawthorne's historical pump poured forth its rill—and it cannot be justly said that a municipal corporation is guilty of maintaining a nuisance where it does no more than maintain a pump in one of its streets. It is immaterial whether a well, hydrant, fountain or the like was dug or erected by a municipal corporation as a part of a general plan of improvement, for a thing of that kind, promotive, as it presumptively is, of public convenience, may be adopted by a municipality and maintained for public use. Kindred cases prove that the general principle here involved has long been recognized. King v. West Riding of Yorkshire, 2 East, 342; Board of Comrs. v. Washington Twp. 121 Ind. 379; Indianapolis v. Lawyer, 88 Ind. 348. See also authorities in notes, Elliott, Roads and Streets, pp. 22, 34, 85.

We cannot presume that a wrong was committed by the officers of a public corporation. On the contrary, we must presume that they rightfully performed their duty. We must therefore presume that the officers of the City were not guilty of an actionable wrong in doing what they did in order to put the well in a suitable condition for convenient public use. The burden is on the appellant to rebut this presumption by bringing forward countervailing acts, not by pleading bare conclusions or recitals. Facts are requisite to constitute a cause of action, and they are wanting in this instance.

Judgment affirmed.

WALLER
v.
BOWLING, Appt.

(....N.C....)

1. A tenant in common may be liable for conversion in wrenching and carrying away machinery from a mill against his co-tenant's protest.
2. After suit is brought for conversion plaintiff cannot be compelled to take back the property.
3. No demand is necessary before suit for conversion of property carried away in the face of plaintiff's protest.

(March 10, 1891.)

APPREAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Granville County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful conversion of certain machinery by defendant to his own use. Affirmed.

Statement by Avery, J.:

This was a civil action tried at the April Term, 1890, of the Superior Court of Granville County, before Womack, Judge. The action was brought to recover damages for unlawfully removing and converting to the defendant's own use certain machinery that had been placed in a mill run by water. On the 28d of August, 1890, and for some years prior to that time, the plaintiff and defendant were owners in fee and tenants in common of the

NOTE.—Liability of tenant in common to action of trover.

The law undoubtedly was formerly that one tenant in common of chattels had no right of action against his co-tenant if he was deprived by the latter of the enjoyment of the common property; and so it is laid down by Littleton, §22, that "if two be possessed of chattels personal in common, if the one take the whole to himself out of the possession of the other, the other hath no other remedy but to take this from him who hath done him the wrong to occupy in common when he can see his time," and the earliest cases are to the same effect. And it may be said to be a general rule at the present time that trover will not lie between tenants in common. See Webb v. Danforth, 1 Day, 301.

Exceptions were soon made to the rule, however, some of which have become as firmly established and are as widely recognised as the rule itself, while others have received only partial recognition.

Exclusive possession of property by one tenant.

The result of the common ownership is that each tenant has a right to the possession of the property, and consequently he can be guilty of no wrong in obtaining and retaining such possession, even though the result is to exclude his co-tenant from the beneficial enjoyment of the property. In such case the rule is uniformly applied, and the only remedy of the excluded tenant appears to be to await an opportunity to obtain the possession and enjoyment of the property or to file a bill in equity for a sale of the property and a division of the proceeds. Cheek v. Wheatley, 3 Sneed, 484; Tyler v. Taylor, 8 Barb. 587; Farr v. Smith, 9 Wend. 340; Given v. Kelly, 85 Pa. 309; Shamburg v. Moorehead, 4 Brewst. 32; Southworth v. Smith, 37 Conn. 355; Bertrand v. Taylor, 18 Ark. 470; Heller v. Hufsmith, 102 Pa. 586; Campbell v. Campbell, 3 Murphy, 66; Hinds v. Terry, Walker (Miss.) 80; Leonard v. Scarborough, 2 Ga. 73; Weld v. Oliver, 21 Pick. 523; Cole v. Terry, 3 Dev. & B. Eq. 25.

The reason assigned for this is because the possession of one is the possession of both. Brown v. Hedges, 1 Salk. 390; Fox v. Hanbury, 3 Cowp. 445; Holford v. Camsell, 1 T. R. 633; Smith v. Stokes, 1 East, 303.

The rule is applied to crops. Keisel v. Earnest, 21 Pa. 90; Ballou v. Hale, 47 N. H. 347.

And it makes no difference that the tenant in possession uses the property as though it was his own exclusively. Fightmaster v. Beasley, 7 J. J. Marsh. 410.

Trover will not lie against the vendee of the original co-tenant while he remains in possession of the property although claiming it as sole owner. Kilgore v. Wood, 56 Me. 154.

Trover will not lie by one tenant in common of real estate against his co-tenant for the conversion of the title deeds because each has an equal right to the possession of them. Daniels v. Daniels, 7 Mass. 137.

One case has recognized a distinction where the property is of such a nature as to be necessarily destroyed by use, holding that in such case trover lies for the appropriation of the property by one of the parties to his exclusive use. Lowe v. Miller, 8 Gratt. 213.

In Illinois the statute has provided for an action in case one tenant assumes exclusive control (Benjamin v. Strempfle, 18 Ill. 463; Boyle v. Levings, 28 Ill. 314); but even in that State there is no liability unless one tenant assumes and exercises exclusive ownership repudiating the rights of the others. Swartwout v. Evans, 37 Ill. 445.

Destruction of property.

The first exception made to the rule was that if one tenant in common gets possession of the common property and destroys it his co-tenant will have an action against him for the wrong. This exception appears in Coke's comments on Littleton, 200 a, b (see also Bacon, Abr. Trover, c), and runs through the books to the present time. In fact it became the basis for all the other apparent exceptions to the rule which now exist, the latter being scarcely more than an application of the original exception to acts which in the judgment of the various courts amount to a destruction.

Trover will lie for a destruction of the property. Tubbs v. Richardson, 6 Vt. 442.

If one tenant in common destroy the common property the other tenant may bring trover against him; but if the common property is not destroyed tract of land on which the mill was situate, each holding one undivided half. On said 28d of August the defendant executed a contract under seal to convey to one John T. McDonough, on the payment of a note of the same date for the sum of $300 by said McDonough and wife. McDonough and his wife, on the same day, also joined in executing a mortgage deed upon his interest in said land to secure the payment of said notes. The said John T. McDonough borrowed of the plaintiff the sum of $200, and executed his note, bearing date March 20, 1888, for said sum, with interest at 8 per cent. The said McDonough purchased with said borrowed money the turbine wheel, shafts, pulleys, level, cog-wheel, etc., which are the subject of this action, and executed, his wife joining, a mortgage, conveying said machinery, to secure said note due plaintiff, the said machinery not then being in said mill. On default in the payment of the $300 note for purchase money of the land, the defendant, on the 17th of January, brought suit against McDonough to subject his interest in the land, and at April Term, 1888, of the Superior Court of Granville obtained a decree of foreclosure, under the terms of which the interest of said McDonough in said land was sold by a commissioner for the sum of $50, the defendant being the purchaser, and said sale was confirmed at the September Term, 1888, of said court. The wheel and some other parts of the machinery were placed in the mill after being conveyed, on the 20th of March, 1885, by mortgage deed, to secure said note for $200, due to plaintiff, but before the said foreclosure sale. The plaintiff alleges that none of the machinery sued for had been placed in position but only taken out of the possession of the other tenants and carried away, the action will not lie. Barnardiston v. Chapman, cited in Heath v. Hubbard, 4 East, 110.

Destruction of the common property or rendering it useless by use will warrant the action. Guyther v. Pettijohn, 6 Fred. L. 888.

Where one tenant in common of a printing press removed certain essential parts of it and carried away several fonts of type so as to render the press incapable of use by himself or his co-tenant, he has so far destroyed the press that his co-tenant may maintain trover against him. Needham v. Hill, 127 Mass. 186.

Rendering the property wholly unfit for the use and purpose for which it was made is destruction. So held where a joint owner of an oil-well, and machinery used for working the same, tore up and removed from the well all the machinery, sold part of the tubing and caused the remainder of the machinery to be taken to another county, and applied the same to his own private use, and sold part of it for old iron. Given v. Kelly, 86 Pa. 308.

Turning hogs which one co-tenant is keeping to fatten out into the street without further account of them is prima facie evidence of destruction which will entitle his co-tenant to maintain trover. Sheldon v. Skinner, 4 Wend. 530.

The destruction of common property which will render one co-tenant liable to the other in trover means such dealing with it that it is no longer the thing held in common, but something else that cannot be used or possessed by the parties as before. Anything equivalent to destruction is sufficient as well as such a change that it is no longer the same thing, or a removal of it and placing it in such a condition that the co-owner cannot avail himself of his right, because the property is out of his reach. Strickland v. Parker, 54 Me. 209.

One tenant in common cannot maintain an action against his companion unless there has been a destruction of the particular chattel or something equivalent to it. Morgan v. Marquis, 9 Exch. 145; Roston v. Morris, 26 N. J. L. 176.

If one tenant in common of a note surrenders it to the maker trover will lie. Winner v. Penniman, 85 Md. 165.

Loss of property.

Loss of property will warrant the action. Hyde v. Stone, 7 Wend. 387; Hall v. Page, 4 Ga. 436; Starnes v. Quinn, 6 Ga. 87.

A destruction takes place whenever the plaintiff's right of recaption has been entirely put an end to by the act of defendant. So, where a vessel was sent on a voyage and lost the action lies. Knight v. Coates, 1 Ir. L. R. 59. See also Barnardiston v. Chapman, cited in Heath v. Hubbard, 4 East, 110. 12 L. R. A.

Conversion of property.

It is evident that the possession or use of the common property by one tenant may become so exclusive as to amount practically to a destruction of the interest of the other. When such is the fact there is no doubt that the excluded tenant may maintain trover for the wrong. Bell v. Laymar, 1 T. B. Mon. 40; Newby v. Harrell, 20 N. C. 154.

The difficulty arises in determining when the facts show a destruction of the interest of the complaining party. It has been stated that if the property is not capable of division and is still in the possession of the defendant there can be no action. Balch v. Jones, 61 Cal. 225.

But that is stronger than other courts state the rule. Thus, in Roddy v. Cox, 20 Ga. 309, the action is held to be maintainable as soon as the party in possession sets up an exclusive claim to the property denying any interest in the co-tenant.

And the latter rule appears in the decisions of other States; thus, in Grove v. Wise, 20 Mich. 162, the court held that trover can be maintained by one tenant in common against his co-tenant after demand made that he be admitted to his rights as co-tenant and a refusal to recognise such rights, coupled with a distinct claim of entire ownership. So where one co-owner of a buggy rakes got possession of the same, and when his co-tenant demanded possession refused it stating that he held and owned the rake in entirety as against his co-tenant, there is such a conversion as will entitle the other to maintain trover. Bray v. Bray, 30 Mich. 480.

The latter rule is a decided innovation on the main rule that trover will not lie between tenants in common and is in advance of the general doctrine on the subject, which is that the refusal to acknowledge the co-tenant's rights upon demand will not justify an action of trover. Balch v. Jones, 61 Cal. 225.

That one tenant in common has obtained the exclusive possession of the chattel (a horse) and claims to be the sole owner, refusing to deliver it up to his co-tenant or permit him to share in the possession, will not sustain an action in trover; a loss, destruction or sale must be shown. Gilbert v. Dickerson, 7 Wend. 450.

With regard to machinery one tenant in common has no right to demand a delivery of the whole or his share of the property and maintain an action for a refusal on the part of his co-tenant to deliver the same. Koningsburg v. Launitz, 1 R.D.Smith, 217.

Even where one tenant in common of machines had the interest of his co-tenant sold under execution and purchased the same himself, taking and claiming exclusive possession, there was no such conversion as would warrant trover. St. John v. Standing, 2 Johns. 463.

in the mill until after the mortgage to him was executed. The issues submitted were as follows: "(1) Did the defendant unlawfully convert the property described in the complaint? Yes. (2) If so, what damage has the plaintiff sustained thereby? Two hundred and fifteen dollars and interest from 18th day of April, 1889, to date, at 6 per cent."

First exception: In addition to the issues agreed upon the defendant tendered the following issue, which the court declined to submit to the jury, and the defendant excepted: "Are the plaintiff and defendant tenants in common of the property alleged to have been converted?" The plaintiff introduced a mortgage executed by John T. McDonough and wife to the plaintiff for the machinery described in the complaint, and also the note secured thereby, for $200, $100 of which was due

March 20, 1888, and $100 of which was due March 20, 1887, and indorsed thereon was a credit of $17 November 23, 1887.

Second exception: The plaintiff was examined in his own behalf, and testified: "I loaned McDonough money. He said he wanted to buy machinery. (Objection by defendant. Objection overruled, and exception by defendant.) The machinery he gave the mortgage on was bought with this borrowed money. It consisted of a turbine wheel, cog-wheel, shaftings, pulleys, etc., necessary to run the mill, and was worth at the time of the conversion $215. It was put in the mill. The defendant tore it up. I saw him do it, and forbid him. He said he was responsible, and would carry it away. He took it away April 18, 1889. The mortgage was made on the machinery before it was put in the mill." Cross-

But where one tenant in common of machinery in the form of personal property removes the same to his own buildings and attaches it in such a way as to make it real estate, there is such a conversion of the property as will maintain trover. Benedict v. Howard, 81 Barb. 571.

So where a tenant in common of a marine railway consisting of iron and wooden rails and sleepers, endless chain, gears and sheep cradle removed the same from the place where they were situated and placed them upon land of his own, claiming the entire right and ownership of the same and denying any right in the co-tenant, it amounts to a conversion for which trover will lie. Strickland v. Parker, 54 Me. 208.

Following are some illustrations of the application of the doctrine:

To maintain the action plaintiff must prove that the conversion went to the destruction of the chattel or to the exclusion of his right. Allen v. Harper, 26 Ala. 689.

Trover for the conversion of one co-tenant's share in crops by the other cannot be maintained unless there is such destruction, sale or disposition of the crops by the one that the other party is precluded by that act from any further enjoyment of it. Warner v. Abbey, 113 Mass. 380.

One tenant in common of a chattel (corn) may maintain an action of trover against his co-tenant who has converted the chattel to his own use, and such a conversion may be proved by the destruction of the chattel, by sale or by such an act of appropriation as will of its nature finally preclude the other party from any future enjoyment of it. Delaney v. Root, 99 Mass. 547.

One tenant's using up the common property, as for instance hay, is a conversion. Lewis v. Clark, 59 Vt. 263.

Any disposition of the property by the defendant for his own use which puts it out of his power to deliver it on demand is a conversion. Webb v. Mann, 3 Mich. 143.

A tenant in common cannot maintain trover to recover possession of a machine from his co-tenant although the latter has leased it to a third person. Poster v. Magee, 2 Lans. 184.

One tenant in common of a chattel cannot sue another for a conversion unless the common property is destroyed, carried beyond the limits of the State, or, when perishable, so disposed of as to prevent the other from recovering it. Grim v. Wickes, 80 N. C. 243.

If one tenant in possession gets possession of the common property, which is perishable, and sends it off to a place unknown to his co-tenant, so that it is wholly lost to the latter, trover will lie. Lucas v. Hardin, 3 Dev. L. 298.

Where a landlord leased property on shares and the tenant put in crops, after which the landlord moved upon the premises and harvested the crops and refused to recognize tenant's rights, it was held to be a conversion. McClure v. Thorpe, 13 West. Rep. 430, 66 Mich. 33.

Where a co-tenant is bound by contract to divide the joint property at a certain place and appropriates it altogether to his own exclusive use under a claim of exclusive right and under circumstances which render a division and delivery in the manner agreed upon practically impossible, there is such a conversion as will sustain an action of trover. Ripley v. Davis, 15 Mich. 79.

A complaint stating that, plaintiff being tenant in common with defendant of certain hay, defendant claiming to be the absolute owner thereof wholly converted the same to his own use to plaintiff's damage, states a good cause of action although plaintiff may be compelled to prove that defendant lost, sold or destroyed the entire hay to make out his cause of action. Thayer v. Gile, 43 Hun, 268.

The conversion of a chattel by a tenant in common to its general and profitable application, though it change the form of the substance, is not such a destruction of the subject matter as to prevent the plaintiff from taking and using it in its altered state; therefore there is no ground for trover. So held in regard to the extracting of oil from the whale. Fennings v. Grenville, 1 Taunt. 241.

Refusal to permit a division or severance of the common interest.

A tendency to extend the exception to embrace a refusal to permit a division of the common property, where such division was possible, appears in the modern cases, the extent of which will appear from the following cases:

The doctrine that the refusal of one tenant in common to relinquish possession is no conversion applies to things in their nature so far indivisible that the share of one cannot be distinguished from that of another; it can have no reasonable application to such commodities as are readily divisible by tale or measure into portions absolutely alike. In such case a refusal to permit a division when demanded is a conversion which will warrant trover. Fiquet v. Allison, 12 Mich. 332.

A tenant in common of oats has a right to sever and take his share of the common bulk, and a refusal on the part of his co-tenant to permit such action will amount to a conversion, for which trover will lie. Channon v. Lusk, 2 Lans. 214.

As to property separable in respect to quantity or quality, by weight or measure, each tenant in common may demand of his co-tenant, having pos-examined, he testified: "The mill seat was jointly owned by defendant and myself. We had first a twelve-foot wheel. The mill hadn't been in operation for two years. A portion of it was rotten. I objected to his carrying it off that day. He said he was going to carry it off if he could. It was some months after the machinery was bought before it was put in the mill. My mortgage was registered first. The turbine is there now, but not by my consent. I did not receive it. I don't know who brought it there." John McDonough, a witness for the plaintiff, testified: "All property taken was worth $340. The property sued for was worth $215. It was taken by the defendant April 18, 1889. The plaintiff did not give permission. I saw it on the defendant's wagon. The defendant's team brought the wheel back seven months afterwards. I executed the mortgage before the property was put in the mill." Cross-examined, he testified: "When the mortgage was executed the turbine alone had not been placed in position. The other property, not sued for, had been." There was other evidence for the plaintiff tending to show the manner of the removal of the property by the defendant, and that it was worth $215. The defendant, being examined in his own behalf, testified: "I moved the machinery sued for from the mill, but did not injure it. I afterwards carried it back to the mill. I got the mud off it, and put three quarts of oil on it. No part of it is missing."

Third exception: The defendant proposed to show by the witness and by the records in the case of Bowling v. McDonough, lately pending in the Granville Superior Court, that the interest of McDonough (one half) in the mill-site session of the whole, his share, and upon refusal, or a conversion by such co-tenant, may sue in his own name, without joining all the other co-tenants. Stall v. Wilbur, 77 N. Y. 168.

Where one tenant in common of tobacco locked it up in his barn and refused to let his co-tenant have any part of it, stating that the latter had no tobacco there, he is liable to trover. Burns v. Winchell, 44 Hun, 268.

Where one tenant in common of cattle drove them away from the farm where they were kept to another place, and after repeated demands by his co-tenant for a division, or an accounting, refused and denied all his co-tenant's right, interest or share in the cattle, and locked it up in his barn, thereby converting it to his sole use, benefit and purposes, in denial of all the right, title and interest of his co-tenant, he is liable to an action of trover. Potter v. Neal, 62 How. Pr. 180.

With respect to grain, one tenant has the right to make a division and take away his share without the consent of his co-tenant, and if he is prevented by the co-tenant from doing so, by the latter's locking up the property and showing a clear intention to appropriate the whole to his own use, he may maintain trover for its conversion, after a proper demand made and failure to obtain a delivery. Lobdell v. Stowell, 37 How. Pr. 88.

Where tenants in common of corn and oats mutually agree how they shall be divided, and the one in possession locks them up in his barn, and when his co-tenant demands his share states that he cannot have it, there is such a conversion as will warrant an action of trover. Lobdell v. Stowell, 51 N. Y. 74.

Some courts, however, have refused to extend the doctrine to this class of cases.

One tenant in common cannot maintain trover against his co-tenant for crops in which they have a joint interest until a separation or severance by the parties, or until such a conversion shall exist as goes to the destruction of the crop or the entire exclusion of the co-tenant from the enjoyment of his right and interest therein. Carr v. Dodge, 40 N. H. 408.

One tenant in common cannot maintain trover against his co-tenant for a conversion of turpentine before a division; he must show a destruction, or some act tantamount thereto. Books v. Moore, 1 Busb. L. 1.

One tenant in common of corn and fodder cannot maintain trover upon the co-tenant's refusal to deliver him his share from the undivided mass. Powell v. Hill, 64 N. C. 171. See also Hill v. Robison, 3 Jones, L. 601; Shearin v. Riggsbee, 97 N. C. 220.

Sale of property.

The question whether or not an exception to the 12 L. R. A.

rule shall be made in case one tenant in common sells the whole of the common property is by no means settled in the affirmative, although the great weight of the modern authority is in favor of extending the exception to such cases. Of course no action will lie in case one tenant sells simply his individual interest, since under those circumstances the purchaser becomes a tenant in common with the owner of the other interest, and some of the courts have reasoned that since one tenant in common cannot give a valid title to his co-tenant's interest, an attempted sale by him has no other effect than simply to make the purchaser a tenant in common with the owner of the other interest, and that there is no ground for an action. Other courts have, however, held that an attempt by one tenant to sell the whole of the property for his own exclusive benefit is such an unwarranted interference by him with his co-tenant's rights as to amount to a practical destruction of them, and to warrant trover. As above stated, the latter doctrine is supported by a majority of the modern cases.

The question which rule should be followed can perhaps be better settled by an examination of the development of the respective rules in the jurisdictions where they have received the most attention.

The rule in New York.

The exception in the case of sales of the property first received recognition in this country, and the New York courts appear to have been the ones to first extend the exception to such cases.

In Selden v. Hickcock, 2 Cal. 187, Spencer, J., states that "one tenant in common cannot maintain trover against another unless the other has destroyed the subject matter of the tenancy," but in that case there had been such a sale by one tenant of his share as severed the tenancy, and the action was held maintainable in that case; so the remark was obiter.

Soon afterwards the question came squarely before the court in a case where one tenant in common of property consisting of rum and scale beams sold the same, and the court held trover would lie. Wilson v. Reed, 8 Johns. 179. This doctrine was again recognized in Hyde v. Stone, 9 Cow. 231.

A general bill of sale by one tenant in common of a ship of the whole of it, followed by an exclusive claim and dominion in the purchaser, is evidence of a conversion which will sustain trover. White v. Osborn, 21 Wend. 75.

Where parties mix their wheat by putting the same into a common bin, if one afterwards sells the whole an action of trover will lie against him. Nowlen v. Coit, 6 Hill, 422.

Where one tenant in common of a ship sold it as was sold by order of court in said case, and purchased by the defendant. Offered: first, in mitigation of damages; and, second, to show bona fides. Objection by the plaintiff, for the reason that the record does not show that the property sued for was the subject of said action, and because the plaintiff was not a party to said action. Objection sustained, and exception by the defendant. Cross-examined, the defendant testified: "The plaintiff forbade my taking the property. I took it up by force. It was not nailed down. The shafting was let into a box of casting. That was let in a sill on the ground. The box was either set on the sill or mortised in it." William Harris, Bernard Bowling and John Davis, witnesses for the defendant, testified that they helped the defendant carry away and bring back the machinery; that it was not injured; and that all of it was brought back. Jerome Bowling, a witness for the defendant, testified: "I have had experience in mills. The 'ink' which holds the shafting is let into a square mortise in the sill, which sets on the ground."

Fourth exception: The defendant asked the following instructions: (1) If the jury believe that the plaintiff and defendant are tenants in common of the property in dispute the plaintiff cannot recover. (2) In this case, the plaintiff, having made no demand on the defendant for the property in dispute, cannot recover at all in this action. (3) At most, the damages done the plaintiff in this action, according to his own evidence, cannot exceed the actual damage done the property by the defendant or his agents while the property was in the possession of said defendant. (4) There is no evidence in this case that the defendant has damaged the his exclusive property, ignoring the rights of his co-tenant, there was such a conversion as would warrant an action of trover. Dyckman v. Valiente, 48 N. Y. 560.

If one tenant sells the whole property for his exclusive benefit the action will lie. Le Barron v. Babcock, 9 L. R. A. 625, 122 N. Y. 153. See also Tyler v. Taylor, 8 Barb. 597; Small v. Robinson, 9 Hun, 420.

Where plaintiff and defendant entered upon a joint venture for the curing and sale of skins, a sale by one of the parties is not in itself a conversion; but if he denies his co-tenant's interest in the skins and refuses to account for the proceeds, but appropriates them to his own use, there will be a conversion for which trover will lie. Green v. Edick, 66 Barb. 567.

The rule in Vermont.

In Vermont there have been a number of decisions, and from the earlier ones it would be very difficult to tell just what rule upon the subject the court would ultimately adopt. Thus in Vickery v. Taft, 1 D. Chip. 241, the judge states a case of property kept by tenants in common for profit or use only in which he says the sale of the property by one of the tenants in common might be treated by the others as a tort. He distinguishes the case in hand from the one cited, however, by showing that, it being one where logs were left to be sawed into lumber upon shares and the one doing the work sold all the lumber when finished, the parties could not be considered joint owners, but, the lumber being capable of a fair division the defendant should have selected his share and sold that only, and by attempting to sell the share of the other rendered himself liable for the tort: and in Tubbs v. Richardson, 6 Vt. 443, in which one of the tenants in common of sixty-eight pounds of wool sold twenty-eight pounds and carried the balance to his own house, refusing to deliver any to his co-tenant, the court says that if this was a case of a sale of the whole of an indivisible piece of property they should probably yield to the late authorities on the point, which held that for such sale trover would lie; it further says that upon principle it would seem to depend upon the kind of property, and the use the party intended to make of it, whether a sale of the whole would be lawful or not, but that in the case before them there was a sale of less than half, and that since the cases went upon the ground of a sale of the whole this case was distinguishable from them, and that the action was not maintainable.

Again in Welch v. Clark, 12 Vt. 681, the court made an examination of the authorities upon the subject, although it was not necessary in the case before them, it being one for trespass, and although 12 L. R. A.

holding that it was not necessary to decide the question, the impression is that there is a disinclination to follow the authorities in favor of the maintenance of the action.

The next case in which the subject appears to have come up is Hurd v. Darling, 14 Vt. 221, in which the court states that nothing short of destroying plaintiff's interest will amount to a conversion of the chattel as against him, and states that in the case before it it is not pretended that such was done, for "he did not even sell it, which, as it would seem, does not amount to a conversion,"—citing Tubbs v. Richardson, supra. In this state of the law the question came squarely before the court in Sanborn v. Morrill, 15 Vt. 700, and the court decided that the action could not be maintained and this has been since adhered to. Barton v. Burton, 27 Vt. 93; Lewis v. Clark, 59 Vt. 363.

The rule in England.

There is a dictum in Parton v. Williams, 3 Barn. & Ald. 385, to the effect that if one tenant in common without authority, either express or implied, sells the common property, he would be a wrongdoer and the act would be a conversion. See also Stancliffe v. Hardwick, 2 Crompt. M. & R. 11.

In Farrar v. Beswick, 1 Mees. & W. 637, Park, B., stated: "I have always understood until the doubt was raised in Parton v. Williams, supra, that one joint tenant or tenant in common of a chattel could not be guilty of a conversion by a sale of the chattel unless it was sold in such a manner as to deprive his partner of his interest in it. A sale in market overt would have that effect."

One of two tenants in common of a chattel is not liable in trover at the suit of his co-tenant for the mere sale of the chattel, though he may be for such a disposition as amounts to a destruction of it. Mayhew v. Herriock, 7 C. B. 220.

The secret removal of entire chattels by one tenant in common without the consent or knowledge of his co-tenant for the purpose of selling them and applying the proceeds to his own use does not amount to a conversion, even although the removal has created a lien on the chattels in favor of a third person. Jones v. Brown, 38 Eng. L. & Eq. 304, 25 L. J. Exch. 345.

In Rathwell v. Rathwell, 26 U. C. Q. B. 179, the court makes quite a full investigation of the English authorities and decides that one tenant in common of chattels may maintain trover against the other for the sale of property where such sale is plainly intended, not for the objects of the joint owners, but in order to deprive the other owner of all interest in the property or proceeds; and in Brady v. Arnold, 19 U. C. C. P. 46, a later case, the court sums up the law as follows: "That if the sale said property at all. (5) The jury can act only on the evidence in this case, and in no aspect can the jury find a verdict for the actual value of the property. (6) There has been no unlawful conversion of the property by the defendant under the evidence. (7) McDonough having made a payment of $17 on the mortgage, Bowling was an equitable tenant in common with Waller to the amount of the excess over and above the mortgage of said Waller in the mill property and in the property removed. All of the above instructions were refused, and the defendant excepted.

Fifth exception: The court charged the jury that if the jury believe that the defendant took the personal property sued for into his possession, the plaintiff being present, forbidding, and carried the same away, exercising a dominion over the same in denial of and inconsistent with the rights of the plaintiff, it being the property of the plaintiff, as further charged the jury will answer the first issue "Yes," and this notwithstanding the fact that there may have been the equitable tenancy in common contended for by defendant; to which charge the defendant excepted.

There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

Messrs. Graham & Winston for appellant.
Messrs. L. C. Edwards and Bachelor & Devereux for appellee.

is in market overt so as to change the property, or if the subject of the joint ownership is sold to a number of purchasers who carry away the articles, or if the consequences attending the sale are such as to put it out of the power of the plaintiff to take the property or to pursue his remedy against the parties who have gotten possession of it, trover will lie.

The rule as generally followed in this country:

So far as the authorities have come to our attention the exception in favor of a sale has been followed or recognized without material qualification in the following States:

Alabama: Permynter v. Kelly, 18 Ala. 718; Smyth v. Tankersley, 20 Ala. 216; Cowles v. Garrett, 30 Ala. 360; Sullivan v. Lawler, 72 Ala. 76; and in that State the action may be maintained although the sale is of an interest in remainder. Arthur v. Gayle, 38 Ala. 265.

Where crops produced on land are to be divided between landlord and tenant the parties are tenants in common and a sale of the entire property by one is a conversion for which the other may maintain trover. Neilson v. Slade, 49 Ala. 253.

California: Williams v. Chadbourne, 6 Cal. 561.

Georgia: Hall v. Page, 4 Ga. 435; Starnes v. Quin, 6 Ga. 87.

Indiana: The point does not appear to have been decided in this State; but see Collins v. Ayres, 67 Ind. 239.

Maine: Dain v. Cowing, 22 Me. 349; Wheeler v. Wheeler, 33 Me. 349.

Maryland: Winner v. Penniman, 35 Md. 165.

Massachusetts: Weld v. Oliver, 21 Pick. 562; Burbank v. Crooker, 73 Mass. 158. See also Goell v. Morse, 126 Mass. 430.

Minnesota: Person v. Wilson, 25 Minn. 189; Shepard v. Pettit, 30 Minn. 121.

Nebraska: Perry v. Granger, 21 Neb. 579.

New Hampshire: White v. Brooks, 48 N. H. 402.

North Carolina: If one co-tenant takes the common property out of the State to parts unknown and sells it, the co-tenant may treat it as a destruction of the property; but a sale within the State is not sufficient. Pitt v. Petway, 12 Ired. L. 73.

Oregon: Yamhill Bridge Co. v. Newby, 1 Or. 173.

Pennsylvania: If one tenant in common of a chattel sells it it is an ouster and conversion and his co-tenant may hold the wrong-doer responsible in damages to the full extent of the value of his interest in the chattel of which he has been deprived. Coursin's App. 79 Pa. 229.

Trover cannot be sustained against the vendor for the mere sale of a chattel in which he was a joint owner, for such a sale passes to the vendee the individual interest only of the vendor. This rule, however, should be restricted to cases in which the property remains in specie. Given v. Kelly, 85 Pa. 300.

Tennessee: Cowan v. Buyers, 1 Cooke, 50; Bains v. McNairy, 4 Humph. 359; Cunningham v. Wood, Id. 417.

Wisconsin: Warren v. Aller, 1 Pinn. 433.

The only cases in this country, outside of Vermont, which have utterly refused to recognize this exception so far as we have seen, are Oviatt v. Sage, 7 Conn. 90, and Bell v. Layman, 1 T. B. Mon. 40.

If a co-tenant sells the whole of the common property to a third person trover cannot be maintained against the latter so long as he retains possession of it, since he merely becomes by his purchase a tenant in common with the original tenant. Dain v. Cowing, 22 Me. 349.

Tenant in common cannot maintain action against purchaser of common property from his co-tenant in the absence of any conversion of the property or proof of its destruction. Soudder v. Calais Steamboat Co. 1 Cliff. 883.

Misuse of property.

Where one misuses the joint property by appropriating it to uses for which it was not designed, and refuses to apply it to the purposes for which it was held by both, the action may be maintained. Agnew v. Johnson, 17 Pa. 378.

If one of the joint owners delivers the property wrongfully to a stranger for purposes inconsistent with the uses for which it was designed, and such stranger denies the title of the other and claims exclusive possession and ownership, trover may be maintained. Ibid.

Permanently changing form of property.

Where one tenant in common of shot iron took possession of it and mixed it with other iron and manufactured the whole into various kinds of ware, which he sold and disposed of, there has been such a conversion of the property as will warrant trover. Redington v. Chase, 44 N. H. 38.

So of incorporating common materials into bridge. Yamhill Bridge Co. v. Newby, 1 Or. 174.

General rules as to when action is maintainable.

The cases in which trover will lie against a tenant in common are reducible to this. They are cases in which something has been done which has destroyed the common property, or where there has been a direct and positive exclusion of the co-tenant in common from the common property. Jacobs v. Seward, L. R. 5 H. L. 474.

The action will not lie unless the property has been actually converted or destroyed. Strong v. Colter, 13 Minn. 84.

In order to maintain the action it must be shown that the common property has been destroyed, sold or otherwise disposed of. Williams v. Nolen, 34 Ala. 168; Farr v. Smith, 9 Wend. 340; Mumford v. McKay, 8 Wend. 444.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The rule laid down by this court in Emery v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 103 N. C. 209, has been repeatedly approved since. Lineberger v. Tidwell, 104 N. C. 510; Brown v. Mitchell, 102 N. C. 387; McAdoo v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 105 N. C. 151.

The defendant, in order to sustain his assignment of error, must show that the court has erred in refusing or failing at his request to present to the jury, through the medium of some issue submitted, a pertinent view of the law applicable to the testimony, whereby the jury may have been misled. Bonds v. Smith, 106 N. C. 584.

A tenant in common of a chattel cannot maintain an action of, or in the nature of, trover against his co-tenant upon the ground merely that his demand for possession of the common property has been refused by the latter, unless he can show that the co-tenant had subsequently consumed it or placed it beyond recovery by means of legal process. Newby v. Harrell, 99 N. C. 149; Pitt v. Petway, 12 Ired. L. 69; Lucas v. Hardin, 3 Dev. L. 398; Cooley, Torts, p. 455; Ripley v. Davis, 15 Mich. 75. But where the tenant in possession of personal chattels withholds the common property from his co-tenant, or wrests it from him, and exercises a dominion over it either in direct denial of or inconsistent with the rights of the latter, an action will lie for conversion. Shearin v. Riggsbee, 97 N. C. 221; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 642; Trustees of the University of N. C. v. State Nat. Bank, 96 N. C. 284; Cooley, Torts, supra; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 686, note a; Grove v. Wise, 39 Mich. 161.

There is some conflict among the authorities, and it is difficult to draw or trace the shadowy line that marks the limit to which a tenant in common may go in the exercise of control over the common property without subjecting himself to liability for conversion. But Schouler, in his work on Personal Property (vol. 1, p. 200), after taking the extreme ground that at common law nothing short of the destruction of a chattel or the conversion of the whole to his own use, or something equivalent, will render the owner in possession liable to his co-owners, says that mere dispossession of a co-tenant might, "if accompanied with other acts showing a hostile intent," amount to a conversion. It would seem that the violent wrenching of the machinery from the mill, when the plaintiff was present, forbidding, was the strongest evidence of such intent. In the case of Strickland v. Parker, 54 Me. 283, the facts were that the purchaser at execution sale of an undivided interest in a tract of land removed the superstructure of a marine railway located on the land, consisting of iron and wooden rails and sleepers, etc., and placed it upon another tract of land. The court held that the property removed constituted a part of the land, and passed with it; but that the co-tenant of the purchaser might maintain trover against him for removing it. The Supreme Court of Michigan, in the case of Grove v. Wise, supra, held that even before condition broken any person wrongfully interfering with a mortgagee's possession of a chattel under his mortgage deed would subject himself to liability to damage in an action for trover brought against him by such mortgagee. The facts in that case were that an undivided half interest in a steam-engine, boiler, and some planing-mill machinery had been mortgaged to the plaintiffs, and the defendant, Wise, having previously owned the other half interest, had subsequent to the date of the mortgage bought, at bankrupt sale, the land on which the building containing the engine, boiler and machinery stood. The case is cited with approval both by Cooley and in the notes to Greenleaf's Evidence. It seems to be settled that where personal property, after being subjected to the lien of a mortgage, is attached to mortgaged land, it will be held to have passed to the mortgagee in the chattel mortgage as against the assignee or holder of the real-estate mortgage, who had notice of the first mortgage when it was attached. Herm. Chat. Mortg. § 188; Sheldon v. Edwards, 35 N. Y. 279; Smith v. Benson, 1 Hill, 176. Where a steam-mill was mortgaged, not including the land on which it stood, it was held by the Supreme Court of Iowa that subsequent purchasers of the mill and premises on which it stood, who had notice of the chattel mortgage, took title to the mill subject to it. Greither v. Alexander, 15 Iowa, 470; Herm. Chat. Mortg. § 188. The general principle that exclusive possession of personal property by one tenant in common, and denial of the rights of his co-tenant, is a conversion for which trover will lie, is supported by numerous adjudications in the courts of other States. Fiquet v. Allison, 13 Mich. 328; Weld v. Oliver, 21 Pick. 563; Winner v. Penniman, 35 Md. 163; Person v. Wilson, 25 Minn. 189.

In Stephens v. Koonce, 103 N. C. 266, the defendant tendered to the plaintiff a judgment for the possession of a steam-engine, boiler, saw-mill, grist-mill, etc., removed from his land, and the costs of the action. The court held that the defendant was not only liable for costs, notwithstanding such offer, but for the full value of the property converted, and interest allowed by the jury, and could not be compelled to take the property back. The general rule is that where one of the owners of an undivided interest in a chattel exercises such dominion over the common property as is inconsistent with the rights of his co-owner, the latter may bring claim and delivery, if the property can be found, and recover the specific property with damage for deterioration as well as detention, or he may elect to sue for damages for the wrongful conversion, and recover the value of the property at the time of the taking and costs. Stephens v. Koonce, supra; Ripley v. Davis, 15 Mich. 75; Hall v. Younts, 87 N. C. 285.

After suit has been brought for the conversion, the owner cannot be compelled to take the property back, but when he does allow it to be returned in a damaged condition its diminished value can be considered in mitigation of damages. 3 Sutherland, Dam. 530.

The rule as to the measure of damages would be different where fixtures, such as gas-piping, are torn from a building, and the building is thereby rendered unfit for occupation and use. There the measure of damages is the cost of restoring the building to its original state and the loss in its rental value while it was uninhabitable. Willis v. Branch, 94 N. C. 142.

It was not necessary that the plaintiff should make a formal demand for possession of the property before bringing the action, if, as both plaintiff and defendant testified, he was present, forbidding, when it was removed from the land. The law did not require him to act on the assumption that one who took it away in the face of his protest would return it at his request, or to accept it in full satisfaction of his damages if there was a voluntary offer to return it. The exceptions insisted on in this court were the first four, and fifth. For the reasons given, we do not think that the judge erred in refusing the instruction asked or substituting that given, or in the rulings excepted to.

There is no error.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Henry C. BUNTING

v.

Robert HOGSETT.

1. The question of proximate cause is ordinarily for the jury, but it is for the court where the facts are not in dispute.
2. Negligence of the engineer of a donkey-engine operated on a circular track, used in connection with a furnace and twice crossing a railroad track, which caused a collision with a railroad train at one of the crossings, is the proximate cause of injuries to a passenger on the train received in a collision at the second crossing, where the rear coach of the train was derailed in the first collision and the train came to a full stop on the second crossing and was there struck by the donkey-engine, from which, after reversing it and shutting off the steam, the engineer and fireman had jumped before the first collision, but which started again at once, the throttle being reopened by the jar of the collision or otherwise and ran into the train on the second crossing.
3. The negligence of a common carrier cannot be imputed to a passenger so as to defeat his right to recover against a third person for negligence.
4. An instruction that there is proof that plaintiff was suffering from Bright's disease and that it was a dangerous disease and should be taken into consideration in determining his expectation of life and loss of earning power, in a suit for personal injuries, is proper where there is testimony of medical experts that he is suffering from that disease with little if any evidence to the contrary.

(January 5, 1891.)

CROSS-APPEALS from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 1, of Allegheny County rendered in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligence of defendant's servants, defendant assigning as error rulings which permitted a recovery, and plaintiff assigning as error rulings which permitted the consideration of evidence in reduction of the amount of damages allowed. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

NOTE.—The doctrine of imputed negligence discussed in notes to Casey v. Smith (Mass.) 9 L. R. A. 259; Chicago City E. Co. v. Robinson (Ill.) 4 L. R. A. 126, and cases referred to.

As to proximate cause of injury, see note to Smithwick v. Hall (Conn.) post, —.

Meers, Edward Campbell and Thomas Patterson, for plaintiff:

A defendant is responsible for the results which actually follow his negligent act. He is not to be relieved because the consequences of his negligence assume a novel or peculiar aspect.

The rule of Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115, is no longer the rule in Pennsylvania.

Meers, A. D. Boyd and Lasear & Orr, for defendant:

If the collision at the second crossing would not have happened if defendant's engineer had remained on the locomotive or donkey on which he was employed, instead of jumping off at the time he did, still defendant would not be answerable for the accident if the circumstances were such as to produce a reasonable apprehension in the mind of the engineer that it was necessary to jump off the locomotive in order to prevent great bodily harm or loss of life to himself.

4 Bl. Com. p. 146; Logus v. Com. 88 Pa. 265; Murray v. Com. 79 Pa. 818.

The defendant is not liable for injuries resulting from the collision at the second crossing if the second collision could not have been foreseen by the engineer as the natural and probable consequence of his conduct.

The injury must be the natural and probable consequence of the negligence—such a consequence as might and ought to have been foreseen by the wrong-doer as likely to flow from his act.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Kerr, 62 Pa. 353; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Hope, 80 Pa. 578; Hoag v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 85 Pa. 298; Hawerly v. State Line & S. R. Co. 135 Pa. 50; *Fairbanks v. If the trainmen were guilty of such negligence which directly contributed to the accident resulting in plaintiffs' injuries, and defendant's employes were also guilty of negligence which also contributed to the accident, then there was such a case of mutual or concurrent negligence as exempts the defendant from liability to the plaintiffs.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Hosgett's Appeal.

The defendant, Robert Hosgett, is the owner of the Lemont furnace, on the line of the South-West Pennsylvania Railroad, and the plaintiff, who, on the 18th of October, 1883, was a passenger upon one of the railroad trains, brings this suit to recover damages for a personal injury, received through the alleged negligence of the defendant's employé. It appears that a railroad track was used in connection with the furnace, and that what is called a "donkey-engine" was operated thereon, in furnishing supplies of stock, ore and coke to the furnace. The furnace track, in running out from the furnace to the coke ovens, forms, as it were, the arc of a circle, and the railroad track, crossing the furnace track twice, subtends the arc as a chord. The collision which occurred at the first crossing was caused by the culpable negligence of the defendant's engineer. This fact is conclusively established by the verdict of the jury, and, in the determination of the questions of law raised upon the assignments of error, this fact must necessarily be assumed. It is unnecessary, therefore, to refer to the evidence bearing upon the question. The appellant's contention is, however, that, as the plaintiff's injuries were not received in that collision, but in the collision which subsequently occurred at the other extremity of the chord, the negligence of the engineer, under the circumstances, cannot be regarded as the proximate, but as the remote, cause of the injury. Ordinarily, the question of proximate cause is for the jury, but, where the facts are not in dispute, the determination of that question is for the court. West Mahanoy Twp. v. Watson, 112 Pa. 574, 8 Cent. Rep. 248, 116 Pa. 844, 8 Cent. Rep. 548.

Some reference to the undisputed facts, therefore, is necessary to the complete understanding of the question thus raised.

It is conceded that in the first collision, although no one was injured, the rear truck of the rear coach of the passenger train was derailed. The brakeman pulled the automatic cord which operates the air-brakes. The engineer put on the air from the engine, and, the truck having regained the track, the train, which consisted of three cars, came to a full stop, with the middle car standing upon the second crossing. The engineer of the donkey says that, about the time of, or immediately before, the collision, he reversed his engine, shut off the steam, and, fearing that they would be crushed, both the engineer and the fireman jumped from it to the ground. By some means, however, presumably by the jar of the collision, the throttle was reopened, and the donkey at once started with some speed around the arc to the second crossing, where it came in collision with the middle coach, in which the plaintiff was riding. The injuries complained of were received in this second collision. The appellant's contention is that the throttle having been closed before Lehan, the engineer, left the donkey, the second collision, under all circumstances, could not have been foreseen by him, as the natural and probable consequences of his conduct, and that, being in fear of his life, he had a right to quit the engine for a place of safety. It may be, perhaps, that the engineer and fireman, being under actual apprehension of great bodily harm, were, in any criminal aspect of the case, justified in leaping from the engine to save themselves, even if, in so doing, they should put in jeopardy the lives of others. But, assuming this to be so, it must be remembered that it was their own negligence which put them in fear of their lives, and constrained them to leap from the engine, and submit it, without control, to the consequences of the collision. They will be justified, perhaps, as we have said, in saving themselves, but it does not follow that either they, or their employer, would not be held for the negligent act which not only put them in peril, but resulted in personal injury to the plaintiff.

It is true, as the appellant contends, that the injury must be the natural and proximate consequence of the negligence,—a consequence likely to flow from the negligent act. The engineer would be held to have foreseen whatever consequences might ensue from his negligence, without the intervention of some other independent agency, and both his employer and himself would be held for what might, in the nature of things, occur in consequence of that negligence, although, in advance, the actual result might have seemed improbable. Oil City Gas Co. v. Robinson, 99 Pa. 6. We do not know that the throttle was opened by the jar of the collision, only from the fact that it was liable to be so, and the engineer will be presumed to have foreseen what was liable to occur. The inquiry must always be whether there was any intermediate cause disconnected from the primary fault, and self-operating, which produced the injury. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256. But no intermediate cause, disconnected with the primary fault, and self-operating, existed in this case to affect the question of the defendant's liability; it was the engineer's negligence that caused the first collision, and what occurred in consequence of this collision was not broken by the intervention of any independent agent, whatever. The first collision derailed the truck, and at the same instant opened the throttle, and turned loose the destructive agency which inflicted the injuries complained of. The negligence of the defendant's engineer was the natural, primary and proximate cause of the entire occurrence.

The appellant's further contention, however, is that, as plaintiff was a passenger on the South-West Pennsylvania Railroad, it was a proper and legal defense for him to show that the negligence of the railroad company contributed to the injury; that in such case the negligence of the company, which was a common carrier, must be imputed to the plaintiff as a passenger in the carrier vehicle. Lockhart v. Lichtenthaler, 46 Pa. 151, and Philadelphia

& R. R. Co. v. Boyer, 97 Pa. 91, are cited in support of this doctrine. In Lockhart v. Lichtenthaler, it was held that where a passenger in a carrier vehicle is injured by a collision, resulting from the negligence of those in charge of it, and those in charge of another vehicle, the carrier only is answerable for the injury; and this case was followed by Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Boyer, where the same rule was applied. The decision in Lockhart v. Lichtenthaler, as we said in Dean v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 129 Pa. 520, 6 L. R. A. 143, was made by adopting the conclusion of the English courts in Bridge v. Grand Junction R. Co., 3 Mees. & W. 247 (1888), in the exchequer; Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115, and Catlin v. Hills, Id. 128 (1849), in the common bench. These cases were followed in the exchequer in Armstrong v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co., 44 L. J. Exch. 89 (1875), L. R. 10 Exch. 47. But Thorogood v. Bryan, supra, which is the leading case, has recently been overruled in the English court of appeal (The Bernina [Mills v. Armstrong], L. R. 12 Prob. Div. 58); and the doctrine, although formerly accepted in many of the States, is now generally disapproved. The authorities in England, and the great current of authorities in this country, are against it. The cases are collected in Dean v. Pennsylvania R. Co., supra. They are numerous, and it is unnecessary to refer to them here. What was there said was given as an individual opinion merely, and was, to some extent, perhaps, obiter dictum; but we are now unanimously of opinion that the views there expressed, somewhat in advance, contain a proper exposition of the law. The identification of the passenger with the negligent driver, or the owner, or with the carrier, as the case may be, without his co-operation or encouragement, is a gratuitous assumption. As Mr. Justice Field said, in Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 29 L. ed. 652: "There is no such identity. The parties are not in the same position. The owner of a public conveyance is a carrier, and the driver, or the person managing it, is his servant. Neither of them is the servant of the passenger, and his asserted identity with them is contradicted by the daily experience of the world." The rationale of the rule of Thorogood v. Bryan is expressly disavowed in our own case of Lockhart v. Lichtenthaler, and it is now rejected as untenable, and wholly indefensible. Nor is there any rule or principle of public policy which will support such a doctrine. If a person is injured by the concurrent and contributory negligence of two persons, one of them being at the time the common carrier of his person, there is no reason founded in public policy, or otherwise, which should release one of them, and hold the other. It is true, the carrier may be subjected to a higher degree of care than his co-tortfeasor, but this affords no reason why either or both of them should not be held to that degree of care, respectively, which the law imposes upon them, and to be answerable in damages accordingly. The general rule undoubtedly is, if a person suffers injury from the joint negligence of two parties, and both are negligent in a manner which contributes to the injury, they are liable jointly and severally, and it would seem in principle to be a matter of no consequence that one of them is a common carrier. Neither the comparative degrees of care required, nor the comparative degrees of culpability established, can affect the liability of either. The whole subject is fully discussed in Dean v. Pennsylvania R. Co., and we do not desire to repeat what was there said.

We think the law was correctly stated in the charge, and in the answers to the points submitted by the defendant's counsel, and the judgment is affirmed.

Bunting's Appeal.

There was evidence in this case that the plaintiff, Henry C. Bunting, at the time of the trial, was suffering from what is known as "Bright's disease of the kidneys." Upon a chemical analysis, albumen was found in his urine. He suffered from dizziness, failure of sight and double vision. He was feeble, had shortness of breath and a staggering gait, and exhibited other symptoms of this malady. The testimony of some of the medical experts was that they believed him to be suffering from Bright's disease, and there was little, if any, evidence to the contrary. The court very properly, therefore, instructed the jury that there was proof of this fact in the case; that it was a dangerous disease; and that they should take this into consideration in determining Mr. Bunting's expectancy of life and the loss of his earning power. Nor was there any evidence to justify the jury in finding that this disease was caused by the personal injuries received in the collision. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Huntington & Warner, for appellant:

The contract of guaranty was non-negotiable, and made in connection with a non-negotiable note, and the plaintiffs could acquire no rights to either except by an assignment.

The assignment is of the note. This is not enough to transfer the guaranty.

Mr. W. Cothren for appellees.

Torrance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts found by the court below, so far as a statement of them is necessary for the decision of the case, may be briefly stated as follows: In April, 1877, one Karrman borrowed of one Sherman $400, and at the same time, and in consideration of the loan, made and delivered to Sherman a promissory note, of which the following is a copy:

"Woodbury, April 26, 1877.

"On demand, for value received, I promise to pay B. A. Sherman $400 (four hundred dollars), with interest annually.

"H. S. Karrman."

When so delivered the note had the following indorsement upon it, made and signed, in consideration of the loan, by the defendant Strong:

"I hereby warrant the within note good and collectible until paid. W. W. Strong."

At this time Karrman had but little property and it is found that the loan was made and the note accepted "upon the individual financial responsibility of the defendant Strong, and upon his guaranty."

Karrman regularly paid the annual interest upon the note to Sherman up to April, 1888. In January, 1884, Sherman demanded of him payment of the note, which being refused, he brought suit against him in February, 1884. While that suit was pending, Sherman, for the sum of $300, paid to him by Daniel S. Lemmon, the plaintiffs' intestate, sold and assigned the note to Lemmon by a written indorsement, directly under the guaranty and signature of Strong, of which the following is a copy:

"February 12, 1884.

"For value received I hereby sell and assign this note to D. S. Lemmon.

"B. A. Sherman."

Thereupon Sherman withdrew from the suit. Lemmon was by order of court substituted as plaintiff, and he prosecuted the suit to final judgment, and took out execution against Karrman. Only a small sum, however, was realized upon the execution, and the present suit is brought to recover from the defendant the balance due upon the note.

In the court below, after the plaintiffs had rested their case, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, "on the ground that the plaintiffs had failed to prove that the contract of guaranty of the defendant Strong, upon said note, had been assigned to the plaintiffs' intestate."

The court below, upon the point involved in this claim, in addition to the facts already stated, finds as follows: "The evidence bearing upon this point and the intention of the parties was the written assignment that appeared upon the note itself signed by the said Sherman as aforesaid, the fact that the said Lemmon at the time the note was purchased by him made an examination of the same, and the fact that the note was not good and collectible as against Karrman, while the defendant Strong was a man of property and in good financial standing. There was nothing said between the said Sherman and the said Lemmon, at the time of the assignment of the note as aforesaid, about the defendant Strong."

The court below came to the conclusion, upon the facts found, that, in making the assignment to Lemmon, Sherman, under the circumstances, had assigned both the contract of

An indorsement on the back of a note of the words, "I guarantee payment of such note when due," does not show title in him, even if the words themselves are sufficient to transfer title, when an identical indorsement by him to another person follows it, with nothing to show that he had acquired title. Brotherton v. Street, 124 Ind. 690.

A signature at the foot of a promissory note, following those of the makers, must be intended to be a signature as guarantor. Parks v. Brinkerhoff, 7 Hill, 668; Jones v. Dow, 187 Mass. 119.

On a guaranty of bills of exchange which are protested for nonpayment, the payee who has trusted to the guaranty may recover of the guarantor the commissions, disbursements and other charges. Lanusee v. Barker, 18 U. S. 8 Wheat. 101, 4 L. ed. 243. See note to Barnes v. Boardman (Mass.) 8 L. R. A. 738.

Kartman and the contract of the defendant, and thereupon overruled the motion for a nonsuit, and rendered judgment for the plaintiffs. Whether the court erred in its conclusion is the principal question in the case.

The defendant argues that the contract of the defendant was a collateral undertaking and not a security; that it was made with Sherman alone, as the first holder of the note for value, was not negotiable, and was attached to a non-negotiable note, and therefore that it did not pass to Lemmon unless it was specially assigned to him by Sherman, and that the transaction between Sherman and Lemmon, resulting in the delivery of the note to Lemmon, did not amount to such an assignment of the defendant's contract.

If we assume, for the sake of the argument, that the guaranty was a collateral undertaking, made with Sherman as the first holder for value, we still think the plaintiffs are entitled to recover upon the facts found.

It is not claimed by the defendant that the contract of guaranty could not under any circumstances be either legally or equitably assigned by Sherman to Lemmon. The claim is that, as matter of law on the facts found, the guaranty was not assigned legally or equitably, under and by virtue of what took place between Sherman and Lemmon relating to the assignment of the note.

The consideration of this claim involves two questions, namely: Did Sherman and Lemmon intend, by what took place between them relative to the sale and purchase of the note, the assignment legally and equitably of the guaranty as well as that of the note? and Did they carry that intent into effect? Let us consider these questions in the order stated.

At the time of the transaction in question the guaranty was practically the only thing that gave the note any value in Sherman's hands. The maker was insolvent and could not pay it. The defendant was abundantly able to pay it. These facts were known to both parties at the time, and in view of this knowledge the transaction took place. Separated from the guaranty the note had little pecuniary value, and apart from the ownership of the note the guaranty had but little meaning or value. They belonged together, on the same paper, and were treated by all concerned as forming one instrument for the recovery of the amount due on the note. The parties each knew that if Sherman assigned the note alone it would be worthless in Lemmon's hands, and that the retention of his rights under the guaranty could in that event do Sherman no good. Under these circumstances Lemmon offers to purchase and Sherman agrees to sell the instrument in question for $300, being nearly the full amount due on the note. The money is paid, the indorsement is made and the instrument is delivered to Lemmon. We think there can be no doubt about Lemmon's intention. He certainly supposed he was getting all the rights which Sherman had under both contracts or he never would have paid his money. And as to Sherman's intention there can be just as little doubt. He was acting in good faith as the court finds. He must have known what Lemmon expected, and, if he did not intend to give him the benefit of the guaranty, should have made such intention manifest. If Sherman intended to limit the operation of the transaction to the assignment of the note proper, he could easily have done so by appropriate words. The defendant says that Sherman in his assignment uses the words "this note," and that these words "seem to restrict the transfer to the note and exclude the guaranty." Read in the light of all the surrounding circumstances this is not of much significance. These parties undoubtedly regarded the paper containing both contracts as one instrument, and probably used the word "note" as descriptive of the paper and all that was written upon it. To suppose that under the circumstances they intended the effect which the defendant claims resulted from this transaction, is to suppose that Sherman was a knave and Lemmon a fool, and for neither of these suppositions does the record afford the slightest ground. We feel bound to hold, therefore, that these parties, as honest men of average intelligence, intended the assignment of the guaranty as well as the assignment of the note.

The next question is, whether in doing what they did they carried out this intent.

The defendant says that no special assignment of the guaranty is claimed by the plaintiffs or found by the court, and if by this is meant that the contract of guaranty is not specifically mentioned or described in Sherman's indorsement, this is true.

Is such a specific assignment necessary under the circumstances? We know of no law which prescribes the form in which the intention of the parties in such cases shall be embodied, and where the law prescribes no form, it will, to accomplish rather than defeat their intent, give effect to such form as they choose to adopt.

Now, in the case at bar, Sherman takes the paper containing both contracts, and writes an assignment upon it, and delivers it to Lemmon, intending thereby to transfer to him, as we have seen, all the beneficial interest in both contracts which Sherman himself then possessed. Why is not this effectual to pass such interest, at least in equity?

Sherman fully intended and Lemmon fully expected such a result; and independently of Sherman's intent, his language and acts should be interpreted in the sense in which he had reason to suppose Lemmon understood them.

The contract and acts of Sherman in this matter should be construed with reference to all the surrounding circumstances, the controlling consideration being to discover and give effect to the mutual intention of the parties.

Such an equitable assignment could certainly be made by a transaction of this kind if so intended. "In any case of the guaranty of a bill or note, the party to whom the guaranty is originally made may in equity assign his right to the holder at the time he transfers the bill or note, and thereby vest in him the equitable, although not the legal, title thereto." 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1774.

Indeed it is unnecessary to cite authorities upon such a point. No special form of words and no prescribed acts are necessary to constitute an equitable assignment. The delivery of a negotiable note without indorsement may operate as an assignment of it in equity. Jones v. Witter, 13 Mass. 804.

The transfer of a debt or obligation usually carries with it as an incident all the securities for its payment, although such securities are not in terms transferred with the principal obligations. Craig v. Parkie, 40 N. Y. 181.

In a Virginia case the court uses the following language: "If the contract of guaranty is not negotiable at law, along with the bond and coupons, it is assignable in equity, and an interest in it passes in equity to each successive holder of the bond or coupon. . . . In order to give effect to the manifest intention of the parties the right to enforce the guaranty, unless lost by laches or otherwise, must be held co-extensive with the right to enforce a bond or coupon. The guaranty as an accessory to the bond or coupon follows it and adheres to it in equity, and the right to enforce the guaranty must be determined by the right to demand payment of the bond or coupon." Arents v. Com., 18 Gratt. 768.

We think this language is quite applicable to the case at bar. We hold, therefore, that Sherman assigned in equity to Lemmon all the beneficial interest which the latter had in the contract of guaranty, and so Lemmon became the equitable and bona fide holder thereof, and as such was entitled to sue in his own name under our statutes. The defendant has cited no case which is inconsistent with this conclusion.

In this opinion the other Judges concurred.

v.

Wallace BARNES.

(....Conn.....)

1. A mutual mistake of grantor and grantee in supposing that land staked and pointed out to NOTE.—Equity jurisdiction to correct mistakes in contracts.

The correction of mistakes in written instruments occurring by accident, fraud or otherwise has been one of the acknowledged branches of equity jurisdiction from the earliest history of the court. Andrews v. Gillespie, 47 N. Y. 491.

It is among the first principles of a court of equity to correct mistakes, and prevent parties from being injured in their property, and especially their freeholds, by any misapprehension or concealment of the true state of facts. Read v. Cramer, 2 N. J. Eq. 277, 34 Am. Dec. 208; Bingham v. Bingham, 1 Ves. Sr. 128; Gee v. Spencer, 1 Vern. 58; Evans v. Llewellyn, 2 Bro. Ch. 151; 1 Story, Eq. 156, 160. See note to Page v. Higgins (Mass.) 5 L. R. A. 152.

It is not material whether the instrument is an executory or an executed agreement, nor is it material whether the proceeding is directly by bill to correct the mistake or the mistake is set up in the answer by way of defense. Leitensdorfer v. Delphy, 15 Mo. 167, 55 Am. Dec. 140; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. 384; Wadsworth v. Wendell, 5 Johns. Ch. 224, 1 L. ed. 1064; Higinbotham v. Burnet, 5 Johns. Ch. 184, 1 L. ed. 1060; *Chamberlain v. the grantee all belonged to the grantor while in fact it included a strip belonging to an adjoining owner, whose land was made a boundary by the description of the premises in the deed, entitles the grantee to have the deed reformed, so as to include such strip, and then to damages for breach of the covenants of warranty and for quiet enjoyment by reason of the failure of title to such strip.

2. A claim for the reformation of a deed and one for damages for breach of covenants of the deed as amended may be joined in the same action, under Gen. Stat., § 877, providing that legal and equitable remedies may be enforced in one action.

3. A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Hartford County in favor of defendant in an action brought to obtain the reformation of a deed and to recover damages for a breach of the covenants contained in it as reformed. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Noble E. Pierce and Epaphroditus Peck, for appellant:

The power and duty of equity to grant reformation of deeds and other writings upon parol evidence of the real intention of the parties, and of the mutual mistake by which they have failed to carry out that intention, is constantly stated in more and more unqualified language.

See Broadway v. Buxton, 43 Conn. 282; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 866; Story, Eq. Jur. § 152; Johnson v. Taber, 10 N. Y. 819; Bush v. Hicks, Ch. 47, 6 L. ed. 804; Coles v. Bowne, 10 Paige, 523, 535, 4 L. ed. 1078, 1080; Hendrickson v. Ivins, 1 N. J. Eq. 562; Workman v. Guthrie, 20 Pa. 495; Raffensberger v. Moon, 3 Johns. Ch. 585, 1 L. ed. 500.

The mistake must be material and free from culpable negligence on the part of the party seeking the equitable relief to warrant the exercise of the equitable jurisdiction. Iverson v. Wilburn, 65 Ga. 108; Penny v. Martin, 4 Johns. Ch. 506, 1 L. ed. 938; Segur v. Tingley, 11 Conn. 124; Weaver v. Carter, 10 Leigh, 37; Trigg v. Bead, 5 Humph. 522; M'Ferran v. Taylor, 7 U. Whether error in the written contract is the result of intentional or unintentional misstatement of the defendant is immaterial, for equity has power to correct it as well in the former as in the latter case. Smith v. Jordon, 13 Minn. 270; Botsford v. McLean, 45 Barb. 473.

A court of equity will not interfere to reform a contract, on the ground of a mistake, unless it is mutual. But mistake on the one side and fraud on the other will authorize a reformation. Welles v.

A deed can be reformed and enforced in the same action.

Thompsonville Seals Mfg. Co. v. Osgood, 26 Conn. 16. See Story, Eq. Jur. § 161; Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 861, 862, 866.

An action for reformation may be brought, not only by the original parties, but by their privies in title.

Story, Eq. Jur. § 165; Bunnell v. Read, supra.

Mr. John J. Jennings, for appellee:

No contract relation exists between the plaintiff and defendant. Barnes has given Butler no deed, has entered into no contract with him. Barnes is privy to no contract with Butler. Butler is a naked assignee of Riggs and Riggs had nothing to assign. Said assignment is void, or at least an assignee thereunder gains no right to bring or maintain a suit.

Prosser v. Edmonds, 1 Younge & C. 481; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1040 h, note; Hill v. Boyle, L. R. 4 Eq. 260.

An action for the reformation of a deed is not sustainable by one who does not, as a matter of fact, connect himself with the arrangement, bargain or contract under which the deed was made; and the mere fact that one is a grantee of the party to whom the deed was made does not so connect him.

Reformation of deed.

When reformation is sought of a deed which, through fraud or mistake, conveyed less land than was orally bought and paid for, the case does not stand as if there were no deed; and the error may be corrected without proof of such part performance as is necessary for a decree of specific performance compelling a conveyance of the whole land when no part of it has been conveyed. *Hitchins v. Seymour, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case the appellee claims at the outset, and as conclusive of the question before us, that the court below has decided as a question of fact that no mistake occurred between the parties to the original deed, which the plaintiff seeks to have reformed, but that it accurately expresses the contract which was made and correctly describes the land which was sold. Is this claim well founded? The finding states that in 1872 the defendant sold to one Riggs a piece of land, which he described and bounded in the deed as follows: "Northerly, on land of the heirs of Mrs. Ann O'Connor, one hundred feet; easterly, on highway called 'North Main Street,' thirty-three feet; southerly, on grantor, one hundred and sixteen feet and ten inches; westerly, on grantor, thirty feet two and a quarter inches;" and the deed contained the usual covenants of warranty and seisin. At the time of the purchase both Barnes and Riggs went upon the land, and Barnes then pointed out four stakes which he had previously placed at the corners, one at each corner, as designating the boundaries of the lot. Both supposed that the lot described in the deed and the lot staked out were identical, and that the lines indicated by the stakes correctly designated the boundaries of the piece of land purchased. There were no buildings on the land, and no fence marked any of the boundaries. Barnes and Riggs, and Butler, the plaintiff, who afterwards purchased the land of Riggs, all supposed that the lot staked out correctly designated the land described in the deeds from Barnes to Riggs and from Riggs to Butler, and that the northerly line of the lot indicated by the stakes correctly marked the boundary line on the land of the heirs of Mrs. O'Connor. The court finds "that the land actually sold and conveyed by Barnes to Riggs, and by Riggs sold and conveyed to the plaintiff, was the piece as described in their deeds; and that all three supposed the land described

Deeds may be reformed not only in cases where the mistake consists in the omission or insertion of words or clauses contrary to the intention of the parties, but in cases where the parties understood what language was contained in the deed if they believed the description corresponded with the actual boundaries intended, and were mistaken therein. Johnson v. Taber, 10 N. Y. 319; DeRiemer v. Cantillon, 4 Johns. Ch. 85, 1 L. ed. 772; Bush v. Hicks, 60 N. Y. 228; Bailey v. Woodbury, 50 Vt. 166; Tabor v. Cilley, 53 Vt. 457.

Where there was a mutual mistake in a deed of partition, which consisted in that the words and figures "north 45 degrees 30 minutes west" did not correctly describe the line agreed upon, the mistake was remediable in equity. May v. Adams, 3 New Eng. Rep. 203, 53 Vt. 74; Freeman's Bank v. Vose, 23 Me. 93; Adams v. Stevens, 49 Me. 362.

in their deeds was identical with the lot staked out by Barnes. But Barnes did not undertake to sell and convey to Riggs any other land than a piece bounded northerly on the land of the heirs of Mrs. Ann O'Connor, and extending southerly on North Main Street, from the line of the land of Mrs. O'Connor, thirty-three feet; and Riggs sold to the plaintiff the same land, having the same northerly line and the same frontage on North Main Street. Barnes had attempted to locate such a piece by placing stakes at its corners, but he had mistaken the correct northerly line. Butler had occupied the lot staked out, supposing it to be the land described in his deed. The decision of the court had ejected him from a portion of the land he was occupying, but not from any part of the land described in his deed. He has lost no land which he actually bought of Riggs. The substance of the whole matter is that Barnes, Riggs and Butler all were mistaken as to the correct location of the northerly line of the piece of land bought and sold by them." From this finding it is evident that the court did not decide, as matter either of law or of fact, that no mistake occurred between the parties to the original deed. A mistake is clearly stated, namely: "that both parties supposed that the lot described in the deed and the lot staked out were identical, and that the lines indicated by the stakes correctly designated the boundaries of the piece of land purchased;" that is to say, both parties supposed that the deed accurately described the lot which was staked out, and which the defendant pointed out as the subject of the sale. This supposition was incorrect. The deed did not accurately describe the northern boundary of the lot so designated and pointed out by the grantor. Here the mistake arose. This was the mistake. The reasoning of the court in coming to its conclusion seems to have been substantially this: The line pointed out as the correct line for the northern boundary, when the sale was made, was indicated by two stakes. The parties supposed that the line so indicated was identical with the O'Connor line, and would be correctly described by bounding the lot sold northerly on land of the heirs of Mrs. O'Connor. The deed did bound the lot northerly on the land of said heirs. Therefore I find that the lot actually sold was the piece described in the deed, and not the piece pointed out and contained within the four stakes, and that the defendant did not undertake to sell and convey to Riggs any other land than a piece bounded northerly on the land of the heirs of Mrs. O'Connor. The conclusion is manifestly a conclusion of law, based upon the idea that the description of the boundaries in the deed must prevail over the boundaries actually pointed out upon the premises, and that the parties must be taken to have intended to contract according to the boundaries named in the deed, although they were mutually mistaken in supposing these were identical with the boundaries pointed out as above stated. The claim which the court overruled, as stated in the finding, was the claim of the plaintiff "that, as matter of law, the pointing out by the defendant to his grantee, while the negotiations were in progress, of a lot exactly located and staked, which lot all the parties supposed to be the lot which was to be sold and conveyed, and the mutual mistake between them by which they gave and received the deeds as correctly describing the staked lot, entitled the plaintiff to a reformation of the deed so as to make it describe the staked lot, and to damages upon the covenants as reformed." In overruling this claim the court manifestly decided that, upon the facts stated, the law was that the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief sought. Was this decision correct? That is the question now presented. As between the original parties, would the grantee have been entitled to a reformation of his deed?

The mistake which the parties made was, as we have seen, that both supposed that the lot described in the deed and the lot staked out were identical. Both supposed that the description in the deed covered the land which was staked off and had been pointed out by the defendant as the lot sold. Notwithstanding this, the court held that the land actually sold and conveyed by the terms of the deed is self evident. That it was the piece sold, is the conclusion upon which the court bases its refusal to reform the deed so as to embrace the lot contained between the lines staked. Notwithstanding, also, the mistake set forth, the court further finds that the defendant did not undertake to sell and convey to Riggs any other land than a piece bounded northerly on the land of the heirs of Mrs. O'Connor. If by the word "undertake" the court means that, taking all the facts together, it must be held that the defendant only agreed to sell what the deed specifies, which is the natural meaning of the word as here used, then the issue is plainly before us. It is clear that, while on the premises, the defendant undertook, both in the sense of offered and agreed, to sell the lot he pointed out. The deed, through the mistake of the parties, did not express that undertaking. What would have prevented the grantee from having it so corrected that it should express the undertaking? It may be suggested that it is evident that the defendant did not intend to sell any land which he did not own, and therefore it was no mistake on his part to bound the land in the deed as he did. But the suggestion is specious. It has reference to the general intent which every honest man has within himself not to sell what is not his own. And yet he may fully intend, as between himself and another, to sell what he mistakenly supposes to be his own. It may no doubt be truly said, in one sense, that the grantor in this case did not intend to sell, nor the grantee to buy, land belonging to the O'Connor heirs. At the same time it is true that the grantor intended to sell and the grantee to buy exactly the lot which was pointed out as for sale between the lines indicated by the stakes. The mistake was in supposing that the line between the north stakes was identical with the O'Connor line. If the grantor had known where that line was, he would have made his stakes conform to it. The bargain was made before the deed was executed. There was no misunderstanding as to the shape or dimensions of the land which was the actual subject of the sale. If the parties had united in fencing it, after the execution and delivery of the deed, they would have built the fence from stake to stake. The true statement of the case would be that the defendant had no intention of encroaching on the O'Connor land when he marked out for sale, and sold, a lot which in fact so encroached, though described in the deed, in accordance with the parties' belief, as bounded north on the O'Connor heirs' land. If the court had found that, though the lot was pointed out, yet the parties intended to bound it north on the O'Connor land, whether the stakes correctly indicated that line or not, such finding would present a very different case and would have been conclusive. If, also, the question had arisen in a court of law as to what land the defendant had sold, then the deed, upon well-known principles, would have been held to express the contract and to exclude parol testimony to vary or contradict its terms. The very reason for coming into a court of chancery is to avoid the application of those principles, and, in a proceeding brought for that purpose, to make the deed conform to the contract of which it purports to be the evidence. It seems to a majority of us that here was a mistake of such a nature as would have entitled the original grantee to have the deed reformed.

Broadway v. Buxton, 48 Conn. 392, was an action upon the covenants of warranty and seisin. Buxton gave a deed of certain land to Broadway, which bounded it west by land of Calvin Hoyt, John L. C. Hoyt, Alva June, and land of Ida Scofield. It appeared, therefore, from the deed that the lands of the four proprietors named extended along the entire length of the western boundary. Such, however, was not the case. One G. W. Young also owned land abutting for several rods on the west. After the execution of the deed, the true divisional line between said Young's land and the land conveyed to Broadway was judicially ascertained and determined. Broadway claimed that by such line he was dispossessed and evicted of a strip of land which was covered by the deed of Buxton to him, and that, therefore, Buxton was liable on the covenants in his deed. To support this claim he offered parol evidence that prior to completing the contract for purchasing the land, and prior to the giving of the deed, the parties went upon the premises, and Buxton pointed out a line of fence constructed partly of stone and partly of brush, running generally in a northerly and southerly direction, as being the western boundary line of the land proposed to be conveyed. This line was in fact one or two rods westerly of the line established as the true divisional line between Young's land and the plaintiff's land. It was for the loss of that strip of land consequent upon establishing the boundary line further east than Broadway anticipated, that the action was brought. This court said: "As this is an action at law on a sealed instrument, the intent of the parties must be gathered from the instrument itself, not from any parol evidence. . . . The western boundary of the land conveyed is the eastern line of the adjacent proprietors, those lands, by the express terms of the deed, being made the plaintiff's western boundary. No line of fence, no visible monuments, are referred to as boundaries, and to interpolate them as such by parol would clearly affect and vary the meaning of that instrument. Such a course is clearly inadmissible. If the plaintiff has been led into error, if he has been deceived or imposed upon by the representations of the defendant as to the western boundary of the land contracted for, and that it extended to a line of fence pointed out, which would give him more land than his deed covers, an action on the covenants can afford no remedy. Resort must be had to a court of equity to correct the deed and make it conform to the intent and agreement of the parties."

In May v. Adams, 58 Vt. 74, 2 New Eng. Rep. 208, two tenants in common divided their land by deed of partition. There was a mutual mistake in the deed, in that the words and figures, "north 45 degrees 30 minutes west" did not correctly describe the line agreed on. The agreed line was recognized and understood by them to be the one described in the deed so long as they were the owners; and the parties to the suit purchased with a like understanding, and also recognized it for several years. When the mistake was discovered, a bill in chancery was brought by May for the reformation of the deeds so as to make them describe accurately the line originally agreed on. It was held that the mistake was remediable in equity, both as between the original owners and their grantees. The court says: "With the deeds reformed, making the division line to follow the old fence, etc., the defendant is secured in his title to all the land that he understood his deed included at the time of his purchase, and the orator is entitled to have the deeds of partition reformed as against the defendant so as to conform to the practical location of the division line as made by the Doanes [the original owners], and understood by the orator and defendant at the times of their respective purchases." See also Bush v. Hicks, 60 N. Y. 298; Beardsley v. Knight, 10 Vt. 185; Taber v. O'Leary, 53 Vt. 487; Wilcox v. Lucas, 121 Mass. 25; Allen v. McGaughey, 81 Ark. 252; Calverley v. Williams, 1 Ves. Jr. 210; Fry. Spec. Perf. § 501; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 866.

For the purpose, then, of putting the original grantee, Riggs, in a position to recover for a breach of the covenants in the defendant's deed, it is clear, both upon principle and authority, that his deed might have been reformed, and made in terms and description to cover the land pointed out and lying withing the lines which connected the corner stakes. Making the deed describe the line pointed out as the boundary could only result in exact justice between the parties to it.

In Johnson v. Taber, 10 N. Y. 319, it was held that where the boundaries of lands are pointed out by the vendor to the purchaser, but in the written contract of sale and in the deed executed in pursuance of it the description is made, by mistake, to include lands not within such boundaries, the deed will be corrected, on the application of the vendor, so as to correspond with the boundaries thus pointed out; and that it is no answer to such application that the description in the contract and deed was made in accordance with the instructions of the vendor, where it appears that both he and the vendee believed the description to correspond with the boundaries.

There being, then, a mutual mistake in the deed, which would have entitled the original grantee to have it reformed, the purchaser from him brings this complaint. Is he entitled to the relief which he demands? And first, irrespective of the facts in this case, can the claims therein made be properly joined in a single complaint? The plaintiff asks for the reformation of the deed, to make it state the true contract between the parties, and then, not a specific performance of the contract thus truly stated, but damages for the breach of covenants which the contract, as amended, will show that he is entitled to upon the facts of the case. Under the Practice Act (Gen. Stat. § 877) all courts which are vested with jurisdiction both at law and in equity may hereafter to the full extent of their respective jurisdictions administer legal and equitable remedies in favor of either party in one and the same suit, so that legal and equitable rights of the parties may be enforced and protected in one action. The rules under said Act (chap. 2, § 11) refer to "a complaint demanding specific equitable relief, and also damages, as equitable relief, incident thereto (as for the reformation of a policy of insurance and the payment of a loss under the same as reformed)."

Pomeroy, in his book on Remedies and Remedial Rights, § 78, treats of the provisions in the several Codes and Practice Acts combining legal and equitable actions and defenses in the same suit. He says: "When a plaintiff is clothed with primary rights, both legal and equitable, growing out of the same cause of action or the same transaction, and is entitled to an equitable remedy and also to a further legal remedy based upon the supposition that the equitable relief is granted, and he sets forth in his complaint the facts which support each class of rights, and which show that he is entitled to each kind of remedy, and demands a judgment awarding both species of relief, the action will be sustained to its full extent in the form adopted." This rule, he says, has been firmly established by the court of last resort in New York, and is adopted in all the States, with one or two exceptions. He states several cases where it has been applied, among them, an action by the holder of the legal title to correct his title-deed, to recover possession of the land according to the correction thus made and to recover damages for withholding such possession, and an action by the grantor of land to correct his deed by the insertion of the exception of the growing timber, and to recover damages for trees, embraced in the exception, wrongfully cut by the grantee. The author further says: "The court, instead of formally conferring the special equitable remedy, and then proceeding to grant the ultimate legal remedy, may treat the former as though accomplished, and render a simple common-law judgment embracing the final legal relief which was the real object of the action." See section 90. It was a maxim of equity jurisprudence before the statutory joinder of legal and equitable actions that when the chancellor had once obtained jurisdiction he would do complete justice; but the limit of his power in that direction was not well defined. Certainly the spirit of our Practice Act, and of Acts of a similar character, would enlarge such jurisdiction, rather than restrict it. The application now is to a single court having both legal and equitable jurisdiction, and the intention of the law is to give the suitor full and complete relief within certain well defined rules as to joinder of actions and parties in a single action. If it be suggested that, inasmuch as the defendant does not own the strip of land in question, a complaint for the reformation of the deed and a specific performance of the reformed contract would not lie, and therefore the court will refuse to reform the deed, we reply that for that very reason—because he cannot obtain a specific performance—the plaintiff is entitled to the relief he is seeking. There is no other way to compel the defendant to pay for what, not owning, he sold. An action of covenant broken will not lie, because, unreformed, the deed does not cover the land. If it cannot be corrected so as to include the land sold, then the grantee is remediless, and the protection expected from the covenant of warranty breaks down just where it is needed.

As to the facts on this point, the finding shows that in 1873 Riggs, the original grantee, sold the land in question to the plaintiff, and conveyed it by deed containing the usual covenants of warranty and seisin, in which it was bounded and described to all intents and purposes precisely as in the original deed. The stakes placed at the corners by the defendant were still standing, and both Riggs and the plaintiff supposed the land described in the deed was the lot designated by the stakes. About the time of the purchase the plaintiff employed a surveyor to locate the boundaries of the described land, who reported that they were correctly designated by the stakes. In 1874 Butler erected a barn on the lot within the boundary line as indicated by the stakes. In 1886 Catherine R. Root, who had become the owner of the land described in the deeds as belonging to the heirs of Mrs. Ann O'Connor, brought an action against the plaintiff, claiming that his barn encroached upon her land. The court found upon the trial of the action the barn to be an encroachment, and also established the boundary line between the lands of said Root and the plaintiff, and it is found by the court below, in accordance with that decision, that the northerly line, as indicated by the stakes, had included in the plaintiff's lot a triangular piece of land belonging to said Root, six and one half inches wide at the front and running out to a point at the rear of the lot. By this decision the plaintiff was ejected from such triangular piece. The title of the plaintiff to the triangular piece, and his right of occupancy, had never been disputed until about the time the action of Root v. Butler was commenced, and the plaintiff did not learn, until final judgment was rendered in that action, that the line of the land of Mrs. O'Connor's heirs and the northerly line of the lot staked out by the defendant were not identical. Riggs executed and delivered to the plaintiff an assignment of all his claim, right and cause of action against the defendant arising out of said conveyance, etc., and authorizing him to bring suit in his own name.

These facts present the case of a grantee in a deed containing the usual covenants of warranty and seisin, who has been evicted from a portion of the granted premises, seeking first, to reform the deed, and second, to recover damages, not against his immediate grantor, but against a remote grantor, who conveyed the premises to his grantor with the same covenants. It is familiar law that the covenants of seisin, and of a right to convey, and against incumbrances, are personal covenants, not running with the land or passing to the assignee; for, if false, there is a breach of them as soon as the deed is executed and they become choses in action, which are not assignable at common law. But the covenants of warranty and the covenant for quiet enjoyment are prospective, and an eviction is necessary to constitute a breach of them. They are therefore, in their nature, real covenants. They run with the land conveyed, and descend to heirs, and vest in assignees. So long as the grantor has not a good title, there is a continuing breach. In respect of them this court held in Booth v. Starr, 1 Conn. 248, that "every assignee may maintain an action against all or any of the prior warrantors till he has obtained satisfaction. This results from the nature of the covenant, for each covenantor covenants with the covenantee and his assigns, and, as the lands are transferable, it is reasonable that covenants annexed to them should be transferred;" and (page 249) "that the nature of the engagement of the first covenantor is to indemnify all the subsequent covenantees from all damages arising from a breach of the covenant." The plaintiff, as assignee of the real covenants of the deed, has also a right of action against the defendant for the reformation of the deed, for the purpose of enabling him to take advantage of the breach of such covenants. An action for reformation may be brought, not only by the original parties, but by their privies in title. Story, Eq. Jur. § 165. This court held in Bunnell v. Reed, 21 Conn. 586, than an execution creditor, to whom land had been set off, could sustain an action against his debtor's grantor for the correction of the deed conveying such land to the debtor, so that it might be made to include the land levied upon, as was intended by the parties thereto, but which by mistake it failed to do.

We have thus disposed of all the questions which it is necessary to consider in order to decide the case before us. There is nothing in the record which shows any such laches on the part of the plaintiff in pursuing his remedies, after his eviction, as would defeat his right to invoke the assistance of a court of equity, and the majority of the court think there is error in the judgment appealed from, and that a new trial should be granted, at which the court of common pleas may reform the deed as herein indicated, and thereupon render judgment for damages for the breach of the covenants not in said deed contained.

There is error, and a new trial is granted.

v.

HALL & UPSON CO.

(39 Conn. 261.)

1. A negligent act or omission to constitute contributory negligence must operate as a proximate cause of the injury or one of the proximate causes, and not merely as a condition.
2. An act or omission that merely increases or adds to the extent of the loss or injury occasioned by another's negligence will not have the effect of contributory negligence to defeat a recovery, though it may affect the amount of damages to be recovered.
3. An employe struck by brick from a falling wall while standing on a platform helping to put ice in a brick building, in consequence of which he was knocked or fell to the ground, is not guilty of contributory negligence.

NOTE.—Action for damages for personal injuries caused by negligence.

Two things must concur to support an action for damages for negligence: the fault of the defendant, and ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff. Butterfield v. Forrester, 11 East, 60.

To enable a plaintiff to recover in an action for negligence, he must show that the defendant was guilty of negligence in the respects charged in the petition, that the negligence charged was the proximate cause of the injury, and that he was free from contributory negligence. Rebelaky v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 79 Iowa, 55.

Contributory negligence as a defense.

Freedom from negligence is not one of the essentials of the defense of contributory negligence. There must be negligence in the defendant before plaintiff can contribute to its injurious results. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hall, 4 L. R. A. 710, 87 Ala. 708; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Copeland, 61 Ala. 376.

A plaintiff suing for negligence cannot recover where his own testimony, even by giving it the most favorable construction, shows that he could have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Loftin (Ga.) Oct. 13, 1890.

A person who is shown by the evidence to have been guilty of contributory negligence cannot recover damages for injury. Dandle v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 42 La. Ann. 683, citing *Schwartz v. To justify a nonsuit, the contributory negligence must appear so clearly that no construction of the evidence, or inference drawn from the facts, would have warranted a contrary conclusion, and that a verdict of the jury the other way would have been set aside as against evidence. Stackus v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 79 N. Y. 466; Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 660, 42 L. ed. 745; Green v. Erie R. Co. 11 Hun, 383, 336; Green v. Erie R. Co. 4 N. Y. Week. Torrance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The general question reserved for our advice in this case is, whether the plaintiff upon the facts found is entitled to the substantial damages or only to the nominal damages found by the court below.

Inasmuch as that court has expressly found that the negligence of the defendant caused or contributed to the injury for which the plaintiff seeks to recover, the decision of the above general question depends upon this single point, namely, whether the acts and conduct of the plaintiff as set forth upon the record constitute or amount to such contributory negligence on his part as will bar his right to substantial damages. The facts found, so far as they bear upon the question for decision, are in substance the following:

The plaintiff was a workman in the service of the defendant, and at the time of the injury complained of was engaged in helping to store ice for the defendant in a certain brick building. In doing this work the plaintiff stood Contributory negligence will not bar a recovery where the injury complained of is in terms or substance willfully committed, or so gross as to lead to the conclusion that it is willful and culpable. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Denson, supra.

A person who has ample time to get across a street, although a vehicle may be approaching, is not guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to do so. Fenton v. Second Ave. R. Co. 56 Hun. 99.

Where one on foot comes into collision with another in a sleigh, and is injured, the fact that the foot traveler did not step out of the beaten track to allow the other to pass is not conclusive evidence of contributory negligence; but that quesupon a platform about five feet wide and seventeen feet long, raised fifteen feet above the ground, and extending from the west side of the building easterly to a point about two feet east of the door or aperture through which the ice was taken in the building. A stout plank of suitable height and strength extended along the outer side of the platform as far as the west side of the door and served as a protective railing or guard to that portion of the platform. In front of the door and east of it the platform was without guard or railing of any kind. A short time prior to the injury the foreman of the defendant stationed the plaintiff on the platform just west of the door and inside the railing, and showed him what his duties were there, and told him "not to go upon the east end of the platform east of the slide and door, as it was not safe to stand there." He did not tell the plaintiff why it was not safe, but the danger which he had in mind was the narrowness and unrailed condition of the platform and the liability by inadvertence to misstep or fall or slip off, the latter being aggravated by the liability of the platform to become slippery from broken ice. These dangers were all manifest. The peril resulting from the accident which happened to the building was not in contemplation.

After the foreman went away the plaintiff, in spite of the orders so given to him, and for reasons of his own apparently, went over to the east end of the platform and worked there. It is found that there was no sufficient reason or excuse for the change of position. One of his fellow workmen, seeing the plaintiff in that place, told him that "it was not safe, and to stand on the other side," but the plaintiff, notwithstanding such warning, remained at work there.

While so at work the brick wall of the building above the platform, in consequence of the negligence of the defendant, gave way, the brick falling upon the platform and thence to the ground. The plaintiff was struck by portions of the descending mass and fell to the earth. He was either knocked off, or his fall, in the condition in which he stood, was inevitable; indeed, had he not fallen when he did, his injuries, which were very serious, would have been worse. Most of the injuries which he actually sustained were occasioned by the fall.

The plaintiff had no knowledge that the wall would be likely to fall or was in any way unsafe, and it is found that "no fault or negligence can be imputed to him in this regard."

In contemplation of the peril from the falling wall, it is found that "the spot where the plaintiff stood could not have been considered more dangerous than the place where he was directed to stand, though in fact most of the

Smith*, 86 Tenn. 45. See East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. De Armond, 86 Tenn. 73.

Voluntary assumption of peril.

If the danger is known and can be avoided, a peril voluntarily and unnecessarily assumed may constitute such contributory negligence as would preclude a recovery. Harris v. Clinton, 7 West. #### Concurrent or co-operating causes of injury.

When two causes co-operate to produce the injury, the proximate cause is the originating and efficient cause which sets the other cause in motion. See notes to Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Lucas (Ind.) 6 L. R. A. 194; Smith v. Kanawha County Ct. (W. Va.) 8 L. R. A. 83; Colorado Cent. R. Co. v. Holmes, 5 Colo. 197; Paduach & M. R. Co. v. Hoehi, 12 Bush, 41; *Cornwall v. brick fell upon the side where he stood, and the result demonstrated therefore that the other side would have been safer in the event which occurred."

Upon these facts the defendant contends that the plaintiff, in going to and remaining on the east end of the platform, contrary to the orders and in spite of the warning given him, and in view of the obvious and manifest danger in so doing, was guilty of such contributory negligence as bars him of his right to recover more than nominal damages.

If the plaintiff's injuries had resulted from any of the perils and dangers attendant upon the mere fact of his standing and working on the east end of the platform, which were obvious and manifest to anyone in his place, which were in the mind of the foreman when he told the plaintiff not to go there, and in view of which his fellow workmen warned him, then this claim of the defendant would be a valid one. But upon the facts found it is without foundation.

The injury to the plaintiff was not the result of any such dangers, but was caused through the negligence of the defendant by the falling walls. This was a source of danger of which he had no knowledge whatever. He was justified in supposing that the wall was safe and would not be likely to fall upon him, no matter where he stood on the platform. He had no reason to anticipate even the slightest danger from that source before or after he changed his position. This being so, he could be guilty of no negligence with respect to this source of danger by changing his position contrary to orders; for negligence presupposes a duty of taking care, and this in turn presupposes knowledge or its legal equivalent.

With respect to that danger the plaintiff upon the facts found must be held to have acted as any reasonably careful man would have acted under the same circumstances. In changing his position contrary to orders he voluntarily took the risk of all perils and dangers which a man of ordinary care in his place ought to have known or could reasonably have anticipated; but as to dangers arising through the defendant's negligence from other sources—dangers which he was not bound to anticipate and of whose existence he had no knowledge,—he took no risk and assumed no duty of taking care. It was the duty of the defendant on the facts found to warn the plaintiff against the danger from the falling wall.

Now the act or omission of a party injured which amounts to what is called contributory negligence, must be a negligent act or omission, and in the production of the injury it must operate as a proximate cause, or one of the proximate causes, and not merely as a condition.

Contributory negligence need not be the sole cause of the injury, but it is sufficient, if it be one of two or more concurring efficient causes, to bar recovery. North Birmingham Street R. Co. v. Calderwood (Ala.) Jan. 31, 1890; West. Railway of Ala. v. Sistrunk, 85 Ala. 352.

The general rule is, that where two or more causes concur, and it cannot be determined which contributed most to the accident, or whether without their concurrence the accident would have happened a recovery cannot be had. See note to Smith v. Proprietors of Ind. Cong. Church (Mass.) 2 L. R. A. 695.

Where it can be shown that the accident would not have happened except for the culpable negligence of the party injured concurring with that of the other party, no action can be maintained. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Aspell, 23 Pa. 147, 62 Am. Dec. 323; Central R. Co. v. Letcher, 60 Ala. 103, 44 Am. Rep. 505.

But it must be such negligence as contributes to the injury. Kennard v. Burton, 25 Mo. 39, 43 Am. Dec. 249.

One negligent person cannot escape liability because of the negligence of a third person which concurred in producing the injury. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Lucas, 6 L. R. A. 193, 119 Ind. 533.

Intervening agency breaks causal connection.

An intervening agency breaks the causal connection, so if an intervening cause is sufficient of itself to cause the misfortune the former must be considered too remote. Seale v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 65 Tex. 274.

Effect produced by an intervening cause. See note to Smith v. Kanawha County Ct. (W. Va.) 8 L. R. A. 84, examples on p. 85.

If, subsequent to the original wrongful or negligent act, a new cause has intervened, of itself sufficient to stand as the cause of a misfortune, the former must be considered as too remote. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Doherty (Tex.) Nov. 8, 1890; Brandon v. Gulf City C. C. & Mfg. Co. 51 Tex. 121; Seale v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. supra; 3 Civil Cas. Ct. App. 437.

If an intervening cause and its probable consequences be such as could reasonably have been anticipated by the original wrong-doer, the connection between the original wrongful act and the resulting injury is not broken so as to relieve the wrong-doer from liability. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. McKinney, 78 Tex. 293. See Seale v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 65 Tex. 273.

Both causes necessarily contribute to a result which was the necessary and unavoidable effect of the first cause, but was hastened by the intervention of a new, independent force, of itself sufficient to produce the effect. Thompson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ala.) 11 L. R. A. 146.

Proximate cause of injury fixes the liability.

The proximate and not the remote cause is to be regarded in considering the question of negligence and liability therefor. See notes to Read v. Nichols (N. Y.) 7 L. R. A. 181; Smith v. Kanawha County Ct. (W. Va.) 8 L. R. A. 82.

If the plaintiff's negligence is the proximate cause of the injury no recovery can be had. Trow v. Vermont Cent. R. Co. 24 Vt. 437.

A recovery by one who has been guilty of contributory negligence, from injuries which have resulted in part from the negligence of another, is permitted, where the defendant failed through his own negligence to discover plaintiff's peril and to use the means at his command to prevent the injury. Kelley v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. (Mo.) 8 L. R. A. 733, and note containing instances.

And if the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided the injury, but failed to exercise such care, his own negligence will be held to be the proximate cause, and he cannot recover unless the remote cause, the negligence of the defendant, resulted from some wanton or willful act or omission of the defendant. Macon & W. R. Co. v. Winn, 19 Ga. 440; Hoehl v. Muscatine, 57 Iowa, 444; Walsh v. Mississippi Valley Transp. Co. 52 Mo. 454.

Defendant's negligence as the proximate cause.

Where the defendant's negligence is the proximate cause of the injury a recovery may be had.

In the case at bar the conduct of the plaintiff, as we have seen, was, with respect to the danger from the falling wall, not negligent for the want of knowledge or its equivalent on the part of the plaintiff.

Nor was his conduct, legally considered, a cause of the injury. It was a condition rather.

If he had not changed his position he might not have been hurt. And so, too, if he had never been born, or had remained at home on the day of the injury, it would not have happened; yet no one would claim that his birth or his not remaining at home that day can in any just or legal sense be deemed a cause of the injury.

The court below has found that the plaintiff's fall in the position in which he stood was due to the giving-way of the wall, and that most of his injuries were occasioned by the fall. His position there, upon the facts found, can no more be considered as a cause of the injury, than it could be in a case where the defendant, in doing some act near the platform without the plaintiff's knowledge, had negligently knocked him to the ground, or had negligently hit him with a stone. Had the injury been occasioned by a misstep or slip from the platform by the carelessness of the plaintiff, or for the want of a railing, the causal connection between the change of position and the injury would, legally speaking, be quite obvious; but from a legal point of view no such connection exists between the change of position and the giving way of the wall.

The plaintiff had full knowledge of and was abundantly cautioned against certain particular sources of peril and danger, and he voluntarily neglected the warnings and took the risk of those perils and dangers. He was injured through the negligence of the defendant from an entirely different source of danger, of which he knew and could know nothing, and of whose existence it was the duty of the defendant to warn him.

Under these circumstances the failure or neglect to heed the warning does not constitute contributory negligence. Gray v. Scott, 66 Pa. 845.

In the case cited certain boys had been warned not to play at a certain point because of some particular and obvious dangers existing there. They failed to heed the warning, and one of them, playing at that place, was killed. His death was caused by the negligence of another and came from a source of danger not obvious and entirely different from any the boys had been warned against. In answering the argument that the boy's failure

Pacific R. Co. v. Houts, 12 Kan. 336; Whalen v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 60 Mo. 323; Manly v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 74 N. C. 655.

If the negligence of a defendant, which contributed directly to the injury, occurred after the danger in which the party had placed himself, and defendant might have averted the accident, he is liable however gross may have been the negligence of the plaintiff placing himself in the position of danger. See note to Erickson v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. (Minn.) 5 L. R. A. 787.

Where plaintiff had negligently exposed himself or his property to injury, and the defendant, with knowledge of the risk the plaintiff had taken, by ordinary care might have avoided doing the injury, his failure to exercise such care would constitute the proximate cause and would render him liable. Schierhold v. North Beach & M. R. Co. 40 Cal. 447; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Sinclair, 62 Ind. 301; McKean v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 55 Iowa, 122; Pacific R. Co. v. Houts, supra; *O'Brien v. C. 310; Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Carroll, 6 Helsk. 347.

Where a passenger on a street-car was injured by a collision thereof with a railroad car left standing close to the street-car track, the negligence of the railroad company, if any, in leaving the car on the track, was only the remote cause of the accident, and such passenger cannot recover for it. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Doherty (Tex.) Nov. 8, 1890.

The cases are numerous which establish these principles of the law of negligence, and may be summarised, in addition to those already specifically noted, as follows: *Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. to heed the warnings was a cause of his death and contributory negligence, the court says: "But because he was under the tramway in the passage below it is thought he was guilty of contributory negligence. He could not be guilty of negligence as to the defendant without there was some reason to expect danger and a duty of care on his part in relation to it. There was ordinarily none. He had a right therefore to suppose everything secure and safely managed on the tramway, and because it was not he was killed. Precisely the same argument could have been used if the boy had been killed in that place by the negligent use of firearms discharged a hundred yards off."

The defendant seems to claim, however, that, although some of the plaintiff's injuries were caused by falling bricks, yet most of them were caused by his fall; and that as he probably would not have fallen had he remained behind the railing, he contributed to his injury by placing himself where in case of such accident there was nothing to prevent his fall.

Whether the claim that he would probably not have fallen had he remained where he was stationed be true or not, must forever remain matter of conjecture. But if its truth could be demonstrated it would not, as we have seen, change the relation of the plaintiff's act to the legal cause of his injury, or make that act, from a legal standpoint, a contributing cause when it was but a condition.

And if the claim means that the plaintiff by his act increased the injury merely, then if this were true it would not be such contributory negligence as would defeat the action. To have that effect it must be an act or omission which contributes to the happening of the act or event which caused the injury. An act or omission that merely increases or adds to the extent of the loss or injury will not have that effect, though of course it may affect the amount of damages recovered in a given case. Gould v. McKenna, 86 Pa. 297; Stebbins v. Central Vermont R. Co. 54 Vt. 464. This claim however, on the facts found, is wholly without foundation.

The plaintiff is entitled to judgment in his favor for $1,000, and the Superior Court is so advised.

In this opinion the other Judges concurred.

BURTON MANSFIELD, Admr. de Bonis non of Dennis McLaughlin, Deceased,
v.

Ann LYNCH, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(59 Conn. 320.)

An overpayment by an administrator to a creditor in the mistaken belief that the estate is solvent where the mistake is one of either law or fact may be recovered back either by the administrator himself or his successor, the administrator de bonis non, although the creditor received it in good faith believing that he was justly entitled thereto; and the fact that the mistake arose through the negligence of the administrator is immaterial if it has caused the creditor no harm.

(Andrews, Ch. J., dissentia.)

(July 10, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the City Court for the City of New Haven in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover back money overpaid to defendant as a creditor of the estate of Dennis McLaughlin, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Joseph B. Morse, for appellant:

The mistake made by the administrator was not such as equity will relieve, and the plaintiff, his successor, as administrator, can have no stronger claim for relief. It is apparent that it was not a mistake of fact. The administrator knew every fact regarding the value of the estate and the number and amount of claims presented.

Money paid under a mistake of law with respect to the liability to make payment, but with full knowledge or with means of obtaining knowledge of all the circumstances, cannot be recovered back.

The mistake must be such as the exercise of ordinary diligence would not have prevented.

Messrs. Samuel A. York and A. D. Penney, for appellee:

The administrator Bradley was never under any legal, equitable or moral obligation to pay, nor was the defendant at any time legally, equitably or morally entitled to receive out of said estate upon her claim more than 81 1/2 per cent; and if more than that was paid her, by mistake of either law or fact, or both, the plaintiff is clearly entitled to recover it back.

Torrance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record in this case discloses the following facts:

On the first of May, 1888, one McLaughlin died intestate, and in fact insolvent, owing the defendant, Ann Lynch, $400 upon a promissory note. On May 14 of that year one Bradley was appointed administrator upon McLaughlin's estate. The court of probate limited a time for the presentation of claims, and within the time all the claims finally allowed against the estate, amounting to $1,696.44, were presented to said Bradley.

Of the claims so presented Bradley allowed some and disallowed others. Among the claims of general creditors so allowed (amounting in all to $705.14), was that of the defendant upon said note, amounting with interest to $424.87. The claims disallowed, amounting to $991.80, were in fact valid claims against the estate, but none of them were evidenced by any writing signed by the deceased, and Bradley believed they were not valid claims on that account. He also honestly but erroneously believed that he had been advised by the judge of probate to disallow all claims presented against the estate not evidenced by a writing signed by the deceased, and supposed that one of the claims was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

On these grounds he disallowed these claims and gave the parties notice of the disallowance. After the time limited for presenting claims had expired, Bradley, acting under the belief that the disallowed claims were no longer claims that could be collected out of the estate, and believing that, this being so, the estate was solvent, paid the defendant's claim in full, and took the note into his possession, on the 19th of December, 1888. In so believing and acting he was honestly mistaken, as the court finds, both as to the matters of fact and as to the matters of law.

Afterwards, in May, 1889, certain creditors whose claims had been so disallowed brought suit against Bradley, and thereupon, by the advice of counsel, he represented to the court of probate that the estate was insolvent, and asked that commissioners be appointed to receive and examine all the claims presented. Thereupon, in May, 1889, the court adjudged the estate to be insolvent and appointed commissioners, to whom Bradley in due time presented all the claims against the estate, including those allowed and paid as well as those disallowed by him; all of which the commissioners allowed, and reported their doings to the court on the 28th of July, 1889, which report was duly accepted, and no appeal has been taken therefrom. In the meantime, on July 1, 1889, Bradley died, and on August 2, 1889, the plaintiff was duly appointed and qualified as administrator de bonis non of the McLaughlin estate.

The estate could at no time in fact pay to the general creditors more than 81  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent on the dollar, which was the percentage finally found due and ordered to be paid by the court.

Before the present suit was brought the plaintiff demanded of the defendant $290.18, which was the amount paid to her by Bradley over and above the allowed percentage. This she refused to pay, and thereupon this suit was brought. The defendant received the amount paid to her by Bradley in good faith, believing the same to be justly due, and she had no actual knowledge of the mistakes on the part of Bradley, or of any of the doings of the commissioners or of the court of probate, before the date of this suit, although public notice thereof was given according to law.

The money so paid to her was by her forthwith deposited in her own name in a savings bank, where it has ever since remained, and is a part of the money attached in this suit.

On these facts the court below rendered judgment that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the $290.18, with interest from December 18, 1888, when it was paid to her. Whether, upon the facts found, the court erred in so deciding, is the general question presented for our consideration.

From the record it is evident that, in fact and in law, it was the duty of the administrator to pay, and the right of the defendant to receive, only $184.69; that the administrator by mistake paid her $290.18 more than she was entitled to receive; and that the loss, if the overpayment cannot be recovered from the defendant, must fall, either upon Bradley's estate or upon the creditors of the McLaughlin estate. Now, whatever view may be taken of Bradley's action in making the overpayment, it seems unjust that the loss should fall upon the creditors, and if Bradley acted in good faith in making it, and did it under a mistaken view of the law or of the facts, or both, it seems hard that the loss should fall on his estate or upon his bondsman.

On the other hand, if the defendant is compelled to repay this amount, she is no worse off than she would have been if no mistake had been made. She retains her pro rata share of the assets, and is not legally harmed, for she thus gets all the law would in any event allow her out of the then known assets of the McLaughlin estate, and she still holds a valid claim against the estate for the balance due her. Viewed in this light it would seem as if the general result arrived at in the judgment of the court below is fair and equitable, and ought not to be disturbed unless the attainment of such a result in a case like the present is forbidden by some stubborn rule or rules of law.

The defendant claims that the judgment below is erroneous on two grounds: first, because on the facts found Bradley himself in his lifetime had no cause of action against the defendant; and second, if he had, still the present plaintiff as administrator de bonis non cannot recover as he now seeks to do upon that cause of action. We will examine these points in their order.

It is claimed that Bradley had no cause of action because his mistake was one of law and not of fact, and because he was guilty of such negligence and laches towards the defendant that no court, either of law or of equity, would have aided them to recover the overpayment.

Bradley paid the defendant's claim in the honest belief that the estate was solvent. But for this belief he would not have paid it in full. It would seem from the finding that this belief arose partly from ignorance of law, and partly from what he mistakenly supposed to be the advice given him by the probate judge, as to the validity of certain claims presented against the estate. He also supposed that one of the claims disallowed was barred by the Statute of Limitations. It is perhaps not clear from the finding whether the court below regarded the mistake which Bradley made in supposing the estate to be solvent as the result of a mistaken view of law or of fact, or of both combined, nor is the settlement of this question very material.

If we concede what the defendant claims, that the overpayment was the result of a mistake of law with full knowledge of all the facts, still we think, even then, that Bradley upon the facts found would, if living, have a right to recover the overpayment upon the principles settled by this court in the case of Northrop v. Graves, 19 Conn. 548. In that case the husband of a legatee, as the result of a mistaken view of the law as applied to the construction of a will by the executors, was paid a sum of money to which by law he was not entitled. In the case at bar the defendant, as the result of a mistaken view of the law as applied in the disallowance of claims against an estate by the administrator, has been paid a sum of money to which she was not by law entitled out of the known assets of McLaughlin's estate. It is true that in Northrop v. Graves the defendant, at the time the money was paid, knew it was not due under the will, and that this knowledge was an element that entered into the decision of that case, but it was by no means the controlling element.

The court in that case said: "We mean distinctly to assert that when money is paid by one under a mistake of his rights and his duty, and which he was under no legal or moral obligation to pay, and which the recipient has no right in good conscience to retain, it may be recovered back in an action of indebitatus assumpsit, whether the mistake be one of law or fact; and this we insist may be done both upon the principles of Christian morals and the common law."

Here are two, and only two, conditions laid down to entitle a plaintiff in such cases to recover. First, the money must be paid by one under a mistake of his rights and his duty, and be such as he is under no moral or legal obligation to pay. Second, the recipient of the money must have no "right in good conscience" to retain it.

In the case at bar we think the first condition is fulfilled. Bradley was not only under no moral or legal obligation to make the overpayment, but on the contrary it was clearly his duty to retain the money so overpaid and divide it among the other general creditors. This duty he in fact violated solely because of a mistake of law or fact or both, it matters not which.

It is said, however, that the second condition is not fulfilled in the case at bar, because as the estate did in fact owe the defendant the whole sum paid, she has "a right in good conscience" to retain it. In one sense it is true that the estate owed the defendant the amount overpaid, but it is not in any legal or moral sense true that it was the duty of the administrator to pay, or the right of the defendant to receive, her claim in full from the then known assets of the estate. Her right was only to receive her pro rata share with the other general creditors, and the unpaid balance still remained a claim in her favor against the estate. If she gets more than this it must be at the expense of the other general creditors or of the administrator. She did in fact get more than she was entitled to solely in consequence of an honest mistake. It is true that when the overpayment was made she had no knowledge of the condition of the estate or of the mistakes of Bradley, but such knowledge on her part is not made one of the conditions of recovery in the case cited, and after she obtained such knowledge she still refused to make the repayment.

Can it then with reason be said she has "a right in good conscience" to retain money which rightfully belongs to the estate, to which she is neither morally nor legally entitled, and which she obtained solely in consequence of an honest mistake which wrought her no harm whatever? Whatever meaning may be given to the somewhat indefinite phrase, "right in good conscience," we think it clear that the defendant had no such right as against Bradley under the circumstances to retain the overpayment, and this fulfills the second condition.

We are aware that upon the general question whether, when all the facts are known, or may with ordinary diligence be known, money paid under a mistake of law may be recovered back, the authorities are in direct conflict, but since the decision of the case of Northrop v. Graves, supra, there can be no doubt as to the position of this court upon this question in a case like the present. It is unnecessary therefore to cite the decisions of other States upon the question, but if it were many such authorities might be found. Such, for instance, are the cases of Culbreath v. Culbreath, 7 Ga. 84; Stevens v. Goodell, 8 Met. 34; Rogers v. Weaver, 5 Ohio, 586; Beatty v. Duffie, 11 La. Ann. 74.

From the case of Culbreath v. Culbreath, here cited, which was decided in 1849, a month or two after our own case of Northrop v. Graves, we quote the following (p. 87): "The question is, Can a party recover back money paid with a knowledge of all the facts, through mistake of the law? We are fully aware that the authorities upon this question are in conflict, as well in England as in this country. Great names and courts of eminent authority are arrayed on either side. It is not one of those questions upon which the mind promptly and satisfactorily arrives at a conclusion. This is true in reference both to principle and authority. . . . I think, and I shall try to prove, that the weight of authority is with us. If it were not so—if authorities were balanced—we feel justified in kicking the beam and ruling according to that naked and changeless equity which forbids that one man should retain the money of his neighbor for which he paid nothing and for which his neighbor received nothing, an equity which is natural, which savages understand, which cultivated reason approves, and which Christianity not only sanctions but in a thousand forms has ordained."

In the case of Rogers v. Weaver, supra, the court says, p. 587: "It is an admitted rule that where money has been paid by mistake it may be recovered back in this action. It appears to us that the payment in this case was made under a mistaken understanding of the true situation of the estate. . . . We think it just and equitable, as well as lawful, to infer a promise to repay the sum received more than was due from the fact of its receipt through mistake." The same principle was acted upon in the case of Bliss v. Lee, 17 Pick. 88.

But it is further said that Bradley knew all the facts and was guilty of gross negligence and laches in this matter towards the defendant, and that on these grounds he had no cause of action. But it nowhere appears that the defendant has been in any way harmed or injured by the claimed negligence or laches of Bradley. She has not changed her position for the worse on that account. She has her pro rata share of the assets now in her hands, and still has a claim for the unpaid balance, even if she is compelled to repay the amount overpaid. If she has given up her note she can undoubtedly easily get it back, and she has in place of it the proved and allowed claim based upon it. We fail to see where she has been legally harmed by Bradley's negligence or laches.

Where money is paid under a mistake of fact, it is no defense to an action brought to recover it that the mistake arose through the plaintiff's negligence, if such negligence caused the defendant no harm. Appleton Bank v. McGilveray, 4 Gray, 518; Kingston Bank v. Ellings, 40 N. Y. 891.

We think the same principle should apply in a case like the present, even where the mistake is one of law.

We also think that if the law is as laid down in Northrop v. Graves as to payments of money made by mistake of law by a party acting in his own right, much more ought the law to be so held in a case where the party making the payment acts in some fiduciary capacity as the agent of others.

We hold, then, that Bradley, if living, would upon the facts found be entitled to recover from the defendant the amount overpaid. The next question is whether the present plaintiff is entitled to recover.

If we are right in our conclusion that Bradley, if living, might on the facts found recover from the defendant the overpayment, then upon principle we see no good reason why the plaintiff may not recover in this action.

It is true that the doctrine of the common law is, that between the administrator and the administrator de bonis non there is little or no privity, and that to the latter is committed only the administration of the goods, chattels and credits of the deceased which have not been administered. It may also be true, perhaps, that if Bradley's estate had made good the overpayment to the plaintiff, Bradley's representatives alone would in that case have had the right to bring this suit; but, notwithstanding these and other reasons that might be urged, we think the plaintiff can maintain this action.

Bradley parted with certain assets of the estate to the defendant by an act which, under the facts found, gave the defendant no right to retain them as against Bradley acting as administrator. After the overpayment the money overpaid still remained assets of the estate, and it was Bradley's duty to recover it back for the benefit of the estate as soon as he knew that the estate was insolvent in fact. After Bradley's death the plaintiff became the sole representative of the estate, the trustee of all persons having an interest in it. Wiggin v. Sweet, 6 Met. 194. It was his duty to take charge of and administer all assets of the estate of the deceased in the hands of the administrator at his decease, or in the hands of third persons, not administered upon. Bradley was, as to the cause of action which he had against the defendant for the overpayment, a trustee for the estate and the other general creditors. Had he in his lifetime instituted a suit to recover the overpayment and then died, the plaintiff by our Statute (§ 569) might have entered and prosecuted such suit to final judgment. We think, in a case like the present, he can as well institute a suit himself as to prosecute one brought by his predecessor.

Whether the suit is brought by the administrator de bonis non, or by Bradley's representatives, can make little or no difference to the defendant. In the one case she pays back to the estate directly, and in the other indirectly, the amount overpaid. In either case she pays it back. That is the object to be accomplished by either method; and we think the present method is the simplest and cheapest for all concerned, and was properly adopted.

We know of no case, and have been referred to none, wherein it is decided that the administrator may not recover in a case like the present. On the other hand in Stevens v. Goodell, supra, the administrator de bonis non was allowed to recover in a case very similar to this. See also Bliss v. Lee, supra, where the executor was allowed to recover a payment made to a creditor beyond his pro rata share by an executor de son tort.

There is no error in the judgment of the court below.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT

William H. ZINN
v.

Wilbur P. RICE.

(....Mass....)

The rule that a malicious prosecution

must have terminated before a suit for damages can be based thereon does not apply to a just cause of action in respect to which the only grievance is that an excessive attachment of goods was made, not to secure the debt, but to injure the defendant.

(May 20, 1891.)

NOTE.—As to action to recover for malicious prosecution of action or malicious abuse of process, 12 L. R. A.

see notes to Antoliff v. June (Mich.) 10 L. R. A. 622; Pope v. Pollock (Ohio) 4 L. R. A. 354.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to a ruling of the Superior Court for Suffolk County (Lathrop, J.) that an action to recover damages for alleged malicious acts done by defendant to plaintiff's injury was prematurely brought, and to an order of nonsuit and entry of the same. Sustained.

Rice instituted a suit against Zinn in which he sought to recover $4,522.45. He laid his damage in his writ at $40,000 and placed various attachments each in the sum of $40,000 upon the real and personal property of Zinn.

At the trial of the present action Zinn offered to prove that the attachments in the prior action had been placed upon two separate pieces of real estate, one of which was worth $15,000 above incumbrances, and also upon a stock of goods worth $100,000; that at the time the suit was brought and the attachments made Zinn was absent from the Commonwealth for the benefit of his health; that Rice's counsel refused to reduce the damages as laid in the writ, but the court subsequently did reduce them to $10,000. Zinn offered to prove actual as well as constructive malice on the part of Rice, and that Rice laid his damages and placed the attachments for the avowed purpose of injuring Zinn; he further offered to prove injury because of such acts. It appearing that the suit in which the attachments were made was still pending, the court ruled that this action was prematurely brought, and for that reason ordered a nonsuit to be entered, which entry was made.

Mr. Benjamin L. M. Tower, for plaintiff:

The sole reason of the rule, that in cases of malicious prosecution the original proceeding must be first determined, is that it may be ascertained whether it was instituted without reasonable or probable cause. In the case at bar that question does not arise.

If it be urged that this defendant may have made a mistake in stating his claim, the complete answer to such an improbable suggestion is, that an innocent mistake can and should be taken advantage of, by way of defense in this present action, whether it be a mistake in the amount of the claim, or in the amount for which the officer was instructed to attach.

Savage v. Brewer, 16 Pick. 453.

It is well settled that in an action for abuse of legal process, it is unnecessary to allege or prove that such process was sued out without probable cause, or that it has terminated.

Page v. Ousking, 38 Me. 523; Gilding v. Eyre, 10 C. B. N. S. 592, 604; Grainger v. Hill, 4 Bing. N. C. 212; Steward v. Gromett, 7 C. B. N. S. 191; Tebbutt v. Holt, 1 Car. & K. 280; Melia v. Neate, 8 Fost. & F. 757; Haywood v. Collinge, 9 Ad. & El. 268; Austin v. Debnam, 3 Barn. & C. 139, 144; Bebinger v. Sweet, 1 Abb. N. C. 263; Sommer v. Witt, 4 Serg. & R. 19; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 452.

Enforcing by arrest or otherwise an erroneous judgment or execution is none the less an abuse or misuse of legal process, that it is strictly within the scope of such process.

Tebbutt v. Holt, Gilding v. Eyre and Steward v. Gromett, supra.

In the case at bar the question whether the attachments were excessive is not an issue in the suit in which the attachments were made.

And in Wilkinson v. Howell, Moody & M. 495, Lord Tenterden says: "The termination must be such as to furnish prima facie evidence that the action was without foundation."

The point here presented has not been decided in Massachusetts, but in Savage v. Brewer, supra, the court says: "It seems to be a well-established principle that if one causes another to be arrested and held to bail, for a debt not due, or for more than is due, and this is done knowingly, an action on the case lies for this abuse of legal process."

Messrs. Robert M. Morse, Jr., Edward A. Upton and Charles E. Hellier, for defendant:

The same principles of law apply to an action to recover damages for excessive attachment as apply to an action for malicious arrest.

See Lindsay v. Larned, 17 Mass. 190; Savage v. Brewer, 16 Pick. 453; Cardinal v. Smith, 109 Mass. 158; Rossiter v. Minnesota B. S. Paper Co. 37 Minn. 296; Newark Coal Co. v. Upson, 40 Ohio St. 17.

To recover in an action for malicious prosecution there must first have been a termination of the action sued upon.

Ripley v. McBarron, 125 Mass. 272; Hamilburgh v. Sheppard, 119 Mass. 30; Cardinal v. Smith, 109 Mass. 158; O'Brien v. Barry, 106 Mass. 300; Bicknell v. Dorion, 16 Pick. 478.

The action in the case at bar is not an action for abuse of legal process.

Johnson v. Reed, 136 Mass. 421.

W. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not contended that the facts alleged in the declaration and offered to be proved at the trial are not sufficient to sustain an action by the plaintiff against the defendant. The defendant's contention is that the action is prematurely brought; that it is an action for malicious prosecution and subject to the rule that a suit for malicious prosecution cannot be maintained until the prosecution has terminated in favor of the plaintiff. But the rule applies only to suits for maliciously instituting groundless prosecutions, and does not apply to the injurious and malicious use of process in proceedings which were commenced with probable cause. The latter being for the malicious use of legal process by acts authorized by its terms may be called actions for malicious prosecution to distinguish them from actions for the abuse of process by doing under color of legal process acts not authorized by it; but there is no rule of law that in such an action the termination of any former suit must be shown. The rule is founded on the necessity of proving that a prosecution which itself puts in issue the truth of the charge on which it is founded is without probable cause. A defendant in such an action cannot bring another action to try the issue tendered him in the first while that issue is pending. The rule is by its terms and nature limited to a prosecution to establish a charge or cause of action, and cannot include an ex parte use of process incidental and collateral to such a prosecution and in defense to which falsity of the charge cannot be shown. Parker v. Langly, 10 Mod. 209; Fortman v. Rottier, 8 Ohio St. 548; Bump v.

Betts, 19 Wend. 421; Barnett v. Reed, 51 Pa. 190; Jenings v. Florence, 2 O. B. N. S. 487; Churchill v. Siggers, 8 El. & Bl. 929; Wentworth v. Bullen, 9 Barn. & C. 840; Wood v. Graves, 144 Mass. 365; Boerett v. Henderson, 146 Mass. 89; Savage v. Brewer, 16 Pick. 458; Bicknell v. Dorion, 16 Pick. 478.

In the case at bar the grievance of the plaintiff is not that the defendant maliciously commenced a groundless suit. He admits that the plaintiff had a good cause of action, and that there is no defense to the suit, and that its termination cannot be in his favor. Nor is his grievance that the defendant abused the process in the former suit, and under color of it did things not authorized by its terms. His grievance is that the defendant, having a just cause of action and a legal suit against this plaintiff, made an excessive attachment of property which he knew was not needed for the security of his debt, not for the purpose of securing his debt, but for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff. If the plaintiff has any right of action, which is not controverted, it is idle to say that he must wait until the former action has terminated in his favor.

The defendant contends that the amount of the debt must be fixed by the determination of the former suit, and that it cannot be shown in this suit. We know of no authority or reason for this. The amount of the debt cannot exceed the amount declared for in the suit, and that is admitted to be due so far certainly as affects this suit. Beyond that there is no question in the former suit, and no issue, and the proceedings complained of were ex parte, and they were terminated by the reduction of the attachment. It is argued that the plaintiff in that suit may amend his declaration and introduce a new cause of action. That case as stated by the plaintiff himself does not present any issue involved in the case at bar, and the possibility that a new cause of action may be added, if it existed, would not be sufficient to show that the issues presented in this case are pending in that, or to bring it within the terms or reason of the rule that the liability of this plaintiff to such possible cause of action can be tried only in that action.

Exceptions sustained.

A lease giving the exclusive privilege, for a certain term of years, of boring and digging for oil and other minerals, is a chattel. Brown v. Beecher, 120 Pa. 590. See Duke v. Hagne, 107 Pa. 57; Titusville Novelty Iron Works' App. 77 Pa. 103; Kile v. Giebner, 5 Cent. Rep. 304, 114 Pa. 831.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal is taken from the judgment of the common pleas, entered for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense. The action is assumpsit to recover certain sums, stipulated in a gas or oil lease, for delay or default in operating the lease. The lease is dated 4th August, 1888, James Ray, the party of the first part, being the lessor, and the Western Pennsylvania Natural Gas Company, the party of the second part, the lessee. The lease provides that, in consideration of certain rents and royalties, the said Ray hath granted, demised and let unto the said Company, "for the sole and only purpose of drilling and operating for petroleum oil and gas, for the term of two years, or so long thereafter as oil or gas is found in paying quantities, a certain tract of land in Cross Creek Township;" etc.; the party of the second part agreeing, in consideration, "to give said first party one eighth ( $\frac{1}{8}$ ) of all the oil from wells producing less than fifty barrels per day, and one fourth ( $\frac{1}{4}$ ) of the oil from all wells producing more than fifty barrels per day;" and, further, "to give \$500 per annum for the gas from each and every well drilled," etc., in case the gas is conducted and used off the premises. The particular clause of the contract, upon which suit is brought, is as follows: "The party of the second part agrees to pay, within ten days from the execution of this lease, the sum of fifty-three dollars, and, if a well is not completed within six months from the execution of this lease, the said second party agrees to pay a further sum of fifty-three dollars, and so on continually every six months, during the continuance of the term herein specified. The said sum of \$600 gas rent shall be paid within one month from the time said well is completed on said premises, and to be paid annually, in advance, thereafter. It is further agreed by said second party that, if a well is not completed within fifteen months from the date of this lease, they are to pay a further sum of \$250, said sum to be a credit on well when drilled, and, in case of failure to complete one well within such time, the party of the second part hereby agrees to pay thereafter to party of the first part, for any future delay, the sum of one hundred and six dollars per annum, within one month after the time for completing such well, as above specified, payable, semi-annually, at the First National Bank of Washington, Pa.; and the party of the first part hereby agrees to accept such sum as full consideration and payment for such yearly delay, until one well shall be completed. And a failure to complete one well, or to make any such payment within such time and such place, as above mentioned, shall render this lease null and void, and to remain without effect between the two parties." The plaintiff's statement averred that the defendant had never completed a well on the demised premises, and claimed to receive \$53, due January 7, 1889; \$53, due July 7, 1889; \$250, due October 7, 1889; and \$53, due January 7, 1890.

The affidavit of defense set forth, in substance, that, by the terms of the lease, the only right granted was the right to operate for gas or oil; that the defendant never entered into the possession for this purpose, while the plaintiff not only at the time of the lease, but when the several sums sued for became due, respectively, was and still is in possession of the land described in the lease, and that, under these circumstances, and according to the law as declared in the decisions of this court, the lease, by its terms, on the defendant's failure to put down one well, or to make any one of the payments specified, became ipso facto null and void, without re-entry; and that, therefore, there is now no liability upon part of the defendant either to pay or to perform.

The case is in all respects governed by our decision in Wills v. Manufacturers Nat. Gas Co., 180 Pa. 222, 5 L. R. A. 603. It is true the lessor's possession was not alluded to in the discussion and decision of that case, nor do we regard the question whether or not he was in possession, subject to the lease, as a matter of any great significance. We agree with the appellant in its contention that, if in such a case as this, the lessor should choose to avail himself of the forfeiture clause in his contract, a formal re-entry, to take advantage of the breach, was not required. The authorities cited by the appellant are decisive of the question.

In Hamilton v. Elliott, 5 Serg. & R. 375, there was a conveyance of a freehold by A to B, upon certain conditions, which were not complied with, the grantor, in accordance with the terms of the grant, remaining in the possession from the time of the conveyance until after the forfeiture accrued; and it was held in a suit by the assignee of A, that, by reason of the breach of the condition, while A was in the actual possession, the estate reverted in A without a formal entry, to take advantage of the breach or notice of the non-performance of the condition. As the grantor was already in the possession, it was deemed unnecessary that he should go out in order that he might re-enter, or that the grantee should have formal notice of what he already knew, viz., that the condition was not performed. To the same effect are the other cases cited by the appellant: Dickey v. McCollough, 2 Watts & S. 99; Feather v. Strohoecker, 3 Penn. & W. 508, and Bear v. Whistler, 7 Watts, 149.

The same rule has been applied to leases for years. Kenrich v. Smick, 7 Watts & S. 41; Sheaffer v. Sheaffer, 87 Pa. 525; Davis v. Moss, 38 Pa. 346; Brown v. Bennett, 75 Pa. 420; Brown v. Vandergrift, 80 Pa. 142; Munroe v. Armstrong, 96 Pa. 307.

But as, by the terms of the lease, Ray, the appellee, was entitled to remain in possession of the land, subject to the right of the Company to drill and operate for oil and gas, his occupancy of the land at and after the time of the breach can be of little consequence, unless by some act in assertion of the forfeiture he gave it a greater effect. It was certainly not necessary that he should abandon the possession to which, by the very terms of his contract, he was entitled, in order that he might insist upon performance by the lessee. The lessor's election to forfeit, while he is in the actual possession, may be regarded as a constructive entry under his title.

But it is said that the doctrine declared in Wills v. Manufacturers Nat. Gas Co., supra, is an innovation or change in the law; that the parties must be presumed to have contracted in view of the general law, as it was expounded when their engagements were formed, and to determine the legal effect of the contract otherwise is to impair its obligation, in contravention of the tenth section of the first article of the Federal Constitution. In Kenrich v. Smick, supra, and in Sheaffer v. Sheaffer, supra, although the condition, in each case, was inserted in the interest of the lessor, it was held that, upon breach of the conditions by the lessee, the lease was, ipso facto, absolutely void, without re-entry, and could not afterwards be affirmed or continued by any subsequent recognition of the tenancy on part of the lessor, or by any act of his, other than the making of a new lease. But, as we said in Wills v. Manufacturers Nat. Gas Co., supra, the rigor of the rule was relaxed in Davis v. Moss, 88 Pa. 846, where the forfeiture was said to depend upon the terms of the instrument, "unless there be evidence to affect the landlord with a waiver of the breach, like the receipt of rent, or other equally unequivocal act," in which case the lease may be continued at the instance of the lessee. The ruling in Davis v. Moss, supra, was the first step in the transition from the doctrine of Kenrich v. Smick to the now well-settled rule laid down in Galey v. Kellerman, 128 Pa. 491, and Wills v. Manufacturers Nat. Gas Co., supra, where the principle is established that, where the condition appears to have been inserted solely in the interest of the lessor, the lease is void upon the breach, if the lessor, by some positive act, elects to take advantage of it. The departure from Davis v. Moss is greater, perhaps, than the reasoning in the case last cited would seem to indicate, but it was taken on due deliberation and careful study of the principles involved, and we are not inclined to recede from the position assumed. It is a somewhat significant fact that in all the cases cited, including Davis v. Moss, the forfeiture was set up by the lessor, in whose interest the condition was inserted, upon the default of the lessee; in none of them, as in the case at bar, did the lessee set up his own default as a cause of forfeiture. No case has been brought to our notice in which the lessee was allowed to take advantage of his own wrong, or to set up his own default, to work a forfeiture of his own contract. It must be conceded, however, that, if the old rule is the right one, this anomalous result must ensue.

Persons may perhaps contract expressly in this form, and to this effect. When they do, the transaction amounts to a mere option, and the lessee, in setting up his own default, simply avails himself of an elective right secured to him in his contract. We do not understand the contract in suit to be of this character. The clear purpose of the lessor was to have his land operated for oil or gas, and the condition was inserted for his benefit. While the obligation on part of the lessee to operate is not expressed in so many words, it arises by necessary implication. The lease was for the expressed purpose of drilling and boring for oil or gas, the lessor, in a certain event, to receive a share of the productions as a royalty, or rent; and, in another event, to be paid $500 per annum for each gas-well, the product of which was conducted from the land for consumption. If a farm is leased for farming purposes, the lessee to deliver to the lessor a share of the crops, in the nature of rent, it would be absurd to say, because there was no express engagement to farm, that the lessee was under no obligation to cultivate the land. An engagement to farm in a proper manner, and to a reasonable extent, is necessarily implied. The clear purpose of the parties to this lease was to have the lands developed, and the half-yearly payments, and the other sums stipulated, were intended not only to spur the operator, but to compensate Ray for the operator's delay or default. The lessor's hands have been tied for two years. We do not know that he lost anything in royalties, or that he suffered by drainage, for the territory might have proved unproductive; but, as the transaction was founded in the hopes that either oil or gas, or both, might be found in paying quantities, it was competent for the parties to contract in advance for the amount of compensation to which, in the event of delay or default in development, the lessor would be entitled. The provision for forfeiture was doubtless inserted in anticipation that the lessee might make default, and become unable to pay, in which event he might put an end to the lessee's pretensions, and seek other means of development. This clause having been inserted as a protection to the lessor, he had the right either to declare the forfeiture or to affirm the continuance of the contract, and, if the lessor did not choose to avail himself of the forfeiture, the lessee cannot set it up as a defense to an action in affirmation of the contract. Galey v. Kellerman and Wills v. Manufacturers Nat. Gas Co., supra.

The courts of highest authority in all of the States, and of the United States, are not infrequently constrained to change their rulings upon questions of the highest importance. In so doing the doctrine is, not that the law is changed, but that the court was mistaken in its former decision, and that the law is, and really always was, as it is expounded in the later decision upon the subject. The members of the judiciary in no proper sense can be said to make or change the law. They simply expound and apply it to individual cases. To this general doctrine there is a well-established exception, as follows: "After a statute has been settled by judicial construction, the construction becomes, so far as contract rights are concerned, as much a part of the statute as the text itself, and a change of decision is, to all intents and purposes, the same in effect on contracts as an amendment of the law by means of a legislative enactment." Douglas v. Pike County, 101 U. S. 677, 25 L. ed. 968. See also Anderson v. Santa Anna Twp. 116 U. S. 861, 29 L. ed. 684, and cases there cited; Cooley, Const. Lim. 474-477. To this effect and no more we understand to be the cases of Ohio L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Debolt, 57 U. S. 16 How. 433, 14 L. ed. 1008; Gelpecke v. Dubuque, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 175, 17 L. ed. 530; Havemeyer v. Iowa Co., 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 294, 18 L. ed. 33, and Ocott v. Fond du Lac County Supra., 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 678, 21 L. ed. 382.

In Ohio L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Debolt, supra, the doctrine is thus stated: "The sound and true rule is that if a contract, when made, was valid by the laws of the State, as then expounded by all the departments of the government, and administered in its courts of justice, its validity and obligation cannot be impaired by any subsequent Act of the Legislature, or the decision of its courts altering the construction of the law." The ruling applies, it will be observed, not to the general law, common to all the States, but to the laws of the State "as" expounded by all the departments of its government; "and it is held that contracts valid by these laws may not be impaired, either by subsequent legislation or by the decisions of its courts altering their construction." The reference is, of course, to the statute law.

In New Orleans Water Works Co. v. Louisiana S. R. Co., 125 U. S. 18, 31 L. ed. 607, the law on this subject is stated as follows: "In order to come within the provision of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, not only must the obligation of a contract have been impaired, but it must have been impaired by a law of the State. The prohibition is aimed at the legislative power of the State, and not at the decisions of its courts, or the acts of administrative or executive boards, or officers, or the doings of corporations or individuals. This court, therefore, has no jurisdiction to review a judgment of the highest court of a State, on the ground that the obligation of a contract has been impaired, unless some Legislative Act of the State has been upheld by the judgment sought to be reviewed." "We are not authorized by the Judiciary Act," says Mr. Justice Miller in Knox v. Exchange Bank of Virginia, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 883, 20 L. ed. 414, "to review the judgments of the state courts, because their judgments refuse to give effect to valid contracts, or because those judgments, in their effect, impair the obligation of contracts. If we did, every case decided in a state court could be brought here, where the party setting up a contract alleged that the court had taken a different view of its obligation to that which he held." To bring the case within this provision of the Federal Constitution, it must be the Constitution, or a statute, or some enactment that has the force of law, either of the State or of some municipality, exercising legislative power delegated by the State, which impairs the obligation of a contract. Williams v. Druffy, 96 U. S. 176-183, 24 L. ed. 716, 717; United States v. New

In the very recent case of Lehigh Water Co. v. Easton, 121 U. S. 388, 30 L. ed. 1059, Mr. Justice Harlan says: "The state court may erroneously determine questions arising under a contract which constitutes the basis of the suit before it; it may hold the contract void which in our opinion is valid; it may adjudge a contract to be valid which in our opinion is void, or its interpretation of the contract may in our opinion be radically wrong; but in neither of such cases would the judgment be reviewable by this court, under the clause of the Constitution protecting the obligation of contracts against impairment by state legislation, and under the existing statutes defining and regulating its jurisdiction, unless that judgment, in terms, or by its necessary operation, gives effect to some provision of the State Constitution, or some legislative enactment of the State, which is claimed by the unsuccessful party to impair the obligation of the particular contract in question." The affidavit, in our opinion, is insufficient, and the judgment was rightly entered.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Opinions of witnesses, expert or other, are not admissible where the circum-

NOTE.—Witnesses; opinion evidence, when not admissible.

The general rule is that witnesses are to testify to facts and not to give their individual opinions. Clifford v. Richardson, 18 Vt. 623; Lawson, Expert and Opin. Ev. Rule 24.

When all the pertinent facts can be sufficiently detailed and described, and when the triers are supposed to be able to form correct conclusions without the aid of opinion or judgment from others, no exception to the rule is allowed. Clifford v. Richardson, supra; Parkhurst v. Masteller, 57 Iowa, 476; Kent v. Miltenberger, 15 Mo. App. 430; Railroad Co. v. Schulta, 43 Ohio St. 370.

In general, wherever the inference is one of skill and judgment, the opinion of experienced persons is admissible; for by such means only can the jury be enabled to form a correct conclusion. Starkie, Ev. 153.

The testimony of opinion may be given where, from the general and indefinite nature of the inquiry, it is not susceptible of direct proof. Lester v. Pittsford, 7 Vt. 161.

The opinions of witnesses, whether experts or not, will not, according to some authorities, be received on the question whether a certain place is dangerous or safe. Chicago v. McGiven, 73 Ill. 847; Way v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 40 Iowa, 841; Topeka v. Sherwood, 39 Kan. 690; Tolson v. Inland & Seaboard Coast. Co. 8 Cent. Rep. 738, 6 Mackey, 30; *King v. Missouri Pac. stances can be fully and adequately described to the jury and are such that their bearing on the issue can be estimated by all men without special knowledge or training.

2. Opinions of witnesses that a raised part of a depot platform or broad step four feet wide and nine inches high is a dangerous place are not admissible, as a brief statement would convey a perfect comprehension of the place and jurymen are capable of judging of the danger.

3. Ordinary care is required of a passenger in alighting from a train and leaving the platform, and in the absence of such care no recovery can be had for injuries sustained by falling over a raised portion of the platform.

(January 5, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 1, of Allegheny County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

On February 8, 1888, Mrs. Graham was a passenger on one of defendant's trains, which she desired to leave at the Federal Street Station in Allegheny City. The train reached that point after dark. She left the train and alighted upon a platform which consisted of two parts of different heights, one the platform proper leading to the exit, which was about nineteen feet wide and about as high as the top of the rails upon the track; the other was about four feet wide and extended along in front of the former between it and the cars. There was no space between the two but the latter was raised about nine inches above the former and was designed to be used as a step, and rendered access to the cars easier. Mrs. Graham started towards the exit without knowing of or observing this difference in the height of the different parts of the platform. When she stepped off from the raised portion she stumbled and fell, receiving the injuries complained of.

At the trial witnesses were permitted to give their opinions as to the safety of the platform as constructed and the admission of this evidence became the basis of the first and second assignments of error:

The 3d, 4th and 5th assignments of error called in question the answers of the court to the following requests for instructions:

"Second. The duty of the defendant Company is to use ordinary care in the construction of its platforms, and, if the jury believe that the platform on which the plaintiff fell was reasonably safe, and one which could be used without danger by a passenger exercising ordinary care, then their verdict should be for the defendant. A. This point is refused.

"Third. If the jury believe that the alleged defect in the platform was a patent one (that is, open and visible), and that there was sufficient light for a person using ordinary care to see and avoid the danger, then their verdict should be for the defendant. A. We cannot say that because the offset in the platform was open and visible, there being sufficient light to see it by a person exercising ordinary care, that the plaintiff cannot recover, without explaining to the jury what constitutes ordinary care under the circumstances of this case. The question here is, Did the plaintiff use or exercise ordinary and proper care on the occasion in question? Here you will consider the facts in evidence. She says she did not know of the offset in the platform. The evidence shows such an offset is not usual in platforms used for the debarking of passengers from railway cars, but, on the contrary, indicates that the usual method was to have the platforms level after they were reached. Passengers are not bound to anticipate and look out for irregularities or offsets which might cause one to fall. Under ordinary circumstances, a passenger has a right to expect an ordinary and usually level and safe exit to the depot or station after he has left the cars, and has, therefore, a right to go along the platform, only exercising such care as would be reasonable and proper under circumstances he was bound to anticipate. With this explanation the point is affirmed.

"Fourth. If the jury believe from the evidence that the distance from the lowest step of a car to the ground is about seventeen inches, and that that distance is greater than children or women can with reasonable comfort and safety step, then it is the duty of the defendant to provide some intermediate step for them at stations; and if the jury believe that the narrow, raised platform or step from which Mrs. Graham fell was placed there for that purpose, and was such a device as could be used by a passenger exercising ordinary care, without injury, then their verdict should be for the defendant. A. This point is refused. We think the proposition is too broad. It means, if I understand it, that if one using ordinary care could use the platform without injury the plaintiff cannot recover. This would seem to say, if affirmed, that because one exercising due care was not hurt, therefore one who was hurt did not exercise due care,—proper care,—which we think does not follow, either as a matter of fact, or as a principle of law. I may be exercising due care, and may be getting along perfectly well, because I may see danger, and, if I see it, I am bound to expect it. If I do not, and fall down, I am not exercising due care, because I know it is there. You do not know it is there, and you fall down; it may be due care. The thing I do would be negligence in me and yet due care in you."

Messrs. John H. Hampton, William Scott and George B. Gordon, for appellant:

As a general rule, a witness is not allowed to give an opinion. The only exception to that rule is that with reference to matters which involve questions of science or peculiar skill to such a degree that when the facts in the case have been given in evidence it is impossible for a person of merely ordinary experience to draw the necessary inference from the facts to reach a conclusion in the case, persons having skill in that art or science may be called to say what would be the proper inference to be drawn from the facts proven.

The degree of care imposed upon a railroad company with reference to its station platforms and approaches thereto is very different from the degree of care required in the appliances which relate to the actual carriage itself. As to its platforms, station houses and approaches thereto, it is only bound to exercise ordinary care.

It is a gross perversion of language to say that the court instructed the jury that the plaintiff had a right to go along the platform without taking the slightest care. On the contrary the court said that the plaintiff was bound to exercise such care as would be reasonable and proper under circumstances he was bound to anticipate. This was proper.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

That the opinions of witnesses are in some cases admissible as evidence, even when not coming properly under the head of "expert testimony," has long been established in practice. In several classes of questions the lines between the witness's judgment or opinion and his affirmation of a fact is so indistinct that it cannot be marked out in practice. Such are questions of identity of persons or things, of the lapse of time, of comparative shape or color or sound, of expression, and, through it, of meaning, etc. In all of these, however positively the witness may affirm facts, what he says is after all only his opinion, but so blended with knowledge and recollection that the line where opinion ends and fact begins cannot be distinguished. Hence both must be admitted or both excluded, and to do the latter is often to shut out the only light the case admits of. In questions, therefore, of identity, of sanity, of handwriting, and some others of like nature, opinions of witnesses having sufficient knowledge of the particular circumstances to form the basis of a responsible judgment have been admitted without hesitation. Such is the elementary doctrine laid down in Greenleaf and other authoritative works, but the theory on which such evidence is admitted is very slightly developed. The cases, however, have extended far beyond the classes mentioned in the text-books, and may be said not only to have become legion, but legion against legion. An examination of a large number of them, while not enabling us to reconcile all the practical applications, does, we think, show that the ground on which such evidence must always rest, as expert testimony, strictly so called, does, is a clear necessity. One of the earliest and strongest cases, since constantly cited in favor of the admission of such testimony, is Porter v. Pequonnock Mfg. Co., 17 Conn. 249 (1845), where the opinions of observers, not professional engineers or builders, were allowed to be given as to the sufficiency of a dam to stand the pressure of a flood, which it was contended ought to have been anticipated. The case is decided without any abstract discussion, but the germ, at least, of the principle may be found in the following language of Storrs, J.: "It is impossible for a person, however skillful or scientific, to give an intelligent opinion on facts testified to by another witness in the manner in which they are frequently related. Such witness may detail in the best manner he can the facts on the subject of which the opinion of a scientific person is sought; but it may be impossible to extract from his testimony the data for such an opinion with sufficient precision and certainty." In the following year (1846), the Supreme Court of Vermont, in Clifford v. Richardson, 18 Vt. 620, put the principle still more clearly, thus: "When all the pertinent facts can be sufficiently detailed and described, and when the triers are supposed to be able to form correct conclusions without the aid of opinion or judgment from others, no exception to the rule is allowed. But . . . the facts are sometimes incapable of being presented with their proper force and significance to any but the observer himself. . . . Under these circumstances, the opinions of witnesses must of necessity be received." This states very clearly and forcibly the principle and the limits of its application. In those matters where mere descriptive language is inadequate to convey to the jury the precise facts or their bearing on the issue, the description by the witness must of necessity be allowed to be supplemented by his opinion, in order to put the jury in position to make the final decision of the fact. It is thus expressed in Com. v. Sturdivant, 117 Mass. 122, where a large number of illustrations are given, some of which, I may say in passing, seem to us extremely questionable: "The exception . . . includes the evidence of common observers testifying to the results of their observation, made at the time, in regard to common appearances or facts, and a condition of things which cannot be reproduced and made palpable to a jury."

But, as necessity is the ground of admissibility, the moment the necessity ceases the exception to the general rule that requires of a witness facts and not opinions ceases also. Hence, whenever the circumstances can be fully and adequately described to the jury, and are such that their bearing on the issue can be estimated by all men, without special knowledge or training, opinions of witnesses, expert or other, are not admissible. This is well stated by Chief Justice Shaw, in New England Glass Co. v. Lovell, 7 Cush. 321: "The principle upon which this evidence is admissible is clear and entirely just. In applying evidence which does not go directly to the fact in issue, but to facts from which the fact in issue is to be inferred, the jury have two duties to perform: First, . . . to ascertain the truth of the fact to which the evidence goes, and thence to infer the truth of the fact in issue. This inference depends on experience. . . . Now, when this experience is of such a nature that it may be presumed to be within the common experience of all men of common education, moving in the ordinary walks of life, there is no room for the evidence of opinion; it is for the jury to draw the inference." The law is thus summed up in the American & English Encyclopedia of Law, title Expert and Opinion Evidence, VI: "Opinions are never received if all the facts can be ascertained and made intelligible to the jury, or if it is such as men in general are capable of comprehending and understanding. The ordinary affairs of life cannot be the subject of expert testimony." See vol. 7, p. 493, and cases there cited.

This examination of elementary principles and general authorities has seemed necessary because our own cases on the exact point are few, and supposed not to be in entire harmony. Passing by the cases where opinions not of experts have been received practically without challenge upon questions of sanity, identity, etc., the first case on the subject is Beatty v. Gilmore, 16 Pa. 468. Defendant was building a house on Market Street, Harrisburg, and had left an area-way from the street into the basement, without a guard or railing, and the plaintiff fell into it. Witnesses were allowed to state their opinion that it was dangerous. This was held to be proper, and the case has been accordingly cited as in favor of the general admissibility of such evidence; and Bell, J., does say that it is "a species of testimony always resorted to in cases like the present." But it appears from the report that there was a porch projecting beyond the area, and that, to fall, a person would have to turn aside from the direct way. It is not, therefore, clear that the mere description of the place would convey to the jury an adequate idea of it with reference to the danger, and this seems to have been in the mind of the court, from the language of the opinion, that testimony as to the dangerous character of the excavation "was, in truth, rather the assertion of a fact dependent in some measure upon opinion than of an abstract opinion without more." That this was the ratio decidendi also appears probable from the cases cited in the opinion, which are clearly cases where the circumstances were incapable of adequate description. So understood, Beatty v. Gilmore is entirely in the line of the best authorities heretofore cited. If not to be so understood, then it must be considered as materially modified by the cases hereafter to be noticed. The next case, Minnequa Springs Imp. Co. v. Coon, 10 W. N. C. 502, was clearly in the same line. The opinions of witnesses as to the violence and unusual character of the storm were certainly necessary to supplement their descriptions, and, as to anything beyond that, this court said that if the witness "had any claims to the character of an expert" the court below would not be reversed on a matter so much within its discretion. The only other case is Franklin F. Ins. Co. v. Gruver, 100 Pa. 266, in which it was held that an insurance expert could not be permitted to give his opinion that the erection of a frame building next to the building insured increased the risk in fact. The basis of decision was indicated in the opinion of Gordon, J.: "How any person can be said to be an expert in that which must necessarily result from observation so general that it must be common to every person we cannot understand." In the same general line are American S. S. Co. v. Landreth, 102 Pa. 135, and Lombard S. Street Pass. R. Co. v. Christian, 124 Pa. 125, though in both of these the admissibility of the testimony was discussed rather as declarations of agents than as opinions necessary for the information of the jury. From this view it appears that our own cases are not really in conflict with each other, and that certainly the latest and most authoritative of them are in harmony with the best elementary doctrine. Some occasional difference in application may be unavoidable, because, as said by Chief Justice Shaw in New England Glass Co. v. Lovell, supra, there is extreme difficulty in laying down any rule precise enough for practical application, and the only proper course is to keep the principle steadily in view, and apply it according to the circumstances of each case. In the present case the alleged dangerous place was a raised part of the platform, or broad step, four feet wide and nine inches high. It came clearly within the range of ordinary experience. The briefest statement would convey a perfect comprehension of the place, and every jurymen who ever got in or out of a car, or went up or down a flight of steps, was as capable of judging of the alleged danger as the witnesses who gave their opinions. The first and second assignments of error must be sustained.

The third, fourth and fifth assignments must also be sustained. There is no situation in which ordinary care is not required of a plaintiff, and want of it a bar to recovery. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Cadow, 120 Pa. 559, 12 Cent. Rep. 725. It is unnecessary to discuss now whether the Railroad Company was bound in its platforms and approaches to use the very utmost degree of care, as it is to passengers during actual carriage. If the result in fact was a platform which could be used without danger by a passenger exercising ordinary care, then the Company had done its duty so far as this plaintiff was concerned; and, as its points were based on the finding of this fact by the jury, they should have been affirmed. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Napheys, 90 Pa. 185.

In the Napheys Case the absence of a step or elevation in the platform was the only negligence alleged, and on it the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff. In the present case the presence of such an elevation seems to have been sufficient for the jury to find negligence and a verdict for the plaintiff. Defendant's counsel, for reasons which are not apparent to us, omitted to ask for a nonsuit, or a peremptory direction in their favor. Notwithstanding the omission, however, it is clear that the admitted facts fail to establish any negligence of defendant, and that the plaintiff must, as a matter of law, always fail to recover. It would therefore be useless to send the case back for another trial.

Judgment reversed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

B. WILLIAMSON, Admr., etc., of J. F. Williamson, Ptf in Err.,

NEWPORT NEWS & MISSISSIPPI VALLEY CO

(...W. Va....)

W. was employed as a brakeman on a freight train by the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company on the 4th day of April, 1888, and, when he applied for such service, stated that he had been employed for six months as brakeman on the same road in the year 1885. In July, 1888, the Newport News & Mississippi Valley Company took charge of said road as lessee. On the 12th day of August, 1888, while on duty on top of his train in daylight, said W. was killed by striking his head against a highway bridge which spanned said railroad track, which was not high enough for a man erect on the car top to pass under. While he was in the service of said Company on both occasions his run was between Huntington and Cannelton on a local freight train, and said bridge was between said points. When leaving Hurricane Station on the morning of the accident about ten minutes before reaching said bridge he was warned by the fireman to look out for the overhead bridge, and was found dead about fifteen feet from the rear end of the car. In a suit by W's administrator against the Newport News & Mississippi Valley Company, defendant demurred to the evidence. Held:

(a) That the demurrer was properly sustained.

(b) That, although the defendant may not have been free from blame on account of lowness of bridge, yet W's want of proper care contributed to the injury, and defendant is not liable.

(c) In entering the service of the defendant under the circumstances, W. was fully aware of the character of the bridge, and while in said service had ample opportunity to become familiar with it, and by continuing in the employment he assumed the risk of being injured by said bridge as incident to the employment.

ages for personal injuries resulting in death and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. L. N. Travenner, Vinson & McDonald and Gibson & Michie, for plaintiff in error:

Shearman and Redfield say, in speaking of the decisions of the courts of Maryland, Missouri and Virginia, which hold that there is no liability of a railroad company for injuries caused to its servants by low bridges over the track: "Decisions more shocking to the moral sense are scarcely conceivable. If they are really law, then a railroad company may fire a cannon, at short intervals, all along its line, sending the balls within four feet of the roofs of its cars, may require its servants to stand on those roofs constantly, under fire, and yet be exempt from liability for the death of any of them who should forget to crouch down, when passing the cannon-stand, provided only that the act of murder goes on punctually, at the same time and place, every day."

Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. § 198.

It is the duty of the railroad company when it becomes necessary to span a highway with a bridge, if reasonably practicable, to place the structure at such an elevation as that trains with their customary employes can pass under it unharmed, and mere knowledge, on the part of the deceased, of the danger, is not of itself contributory negligence.

Johnson*, 2 West. Rep. 388, 116 Ill. 206; St. Louis, Ft. S. & W. R. Co. v. Erwin, 87 Kan. 701; Louisville, N. A. & O. R. Co. v. Wright, 18 West. Rep. 798, 115 Ind. 378.

Messrs. Simms & Enslow, for defendant in error:

A railroad cannot be held responsible in damages to an employe for its failure to maintain and keep bridges over its line at such a height from its track as to allow its employes to stand erect when passing under them.

English, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to a judgment of the Circuit Court of Cabell County, rendered on the 15th day of March, 1889, in an action of trespass on the case, in which B. Williamson, administrator of the estate of J. F. Williamson, deceased, was plaintiff, and the Newport News & Mississippi Valley Company, a corporation, was defendant. The plaintiff in said action sought to recover from the defendant Company damages to the amount of $10,000 for causing the death of the plaintiff's intestate, J. F. Williamson, by the negligence of the said defendant, and, as the plaintiff alleges, without any negligence on the part of said J. F. Williamson. The case was decided upon a demurrer to the evidence in the court below, which evidence is set forth in the record under the rule of practice which prevails in such cases; and, in considering the propriety of the action of the court below in sustaining the demurrer to the evidence, the practice requires us "to consider the demurrant as admitting all that may be reasonably inferred by the jury from the evidence given by the other party, and as waiving all the evidence on his part which contradicts that offered by the other party, or the credit of which is impeached, and all inferences from his own evidence which do not necessarily flow from it." Muhleman v. National Ins. Co. 6 W. Va. 508; Lee v. Virginia & M. Bridge Co. 18 W. Va. 299; Allen v. Bartlett, 20 W. Va. 46; Garrett v. Ramsey, 26 W. Va. 345.

It appears from an examination of the evidence, under this rule, that the plaintiff's intestate was in the employ of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company for about six months in the year 1885, and that he was in the employ of the same railway from the 4th day of April, 1886, until the 12th of August, 1886, each time acting as brakeman, and that while he was so employed in the year 1886 he was running on said freight trains between Huntington and Cannelton, W. Va.; that some time in July, 1886, said railway commenced doing business in the name of the "Newport News & Mississippi Valley Company," and was so operating said road at the time the plaintiff was injured. It also appears that at the time the plaintiff entered the service of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company, on the 4th of April, 1886, he agreed to study the rules governing employes on said road carefully, to keep posted and obey them; and on examination at that time, when asked: "Do you know that bridges, including highway bridges and tunnels on this line, are too low to clear a man standing on a box-car?" answered "Yes." So far as the employes of said railroad were concerned, no changes appear to have been made in the rules, management and regulations. The name of the company managing the road was changed, and the vouchers were paid them after July, 1886, by the Newport News & Mississippi Valley Company.

How the plaintiff's intestate came to his death does not affirmatively appear, but circumstances would seem to indicate that his death ensued from coming in contact with a bridge which spans said railroad at a point between Hurricane and Milton Stations. This is the theory claimed by the plaintiff, and assuming it to be the correct one, it appears from the testimony of the engineer, Poindexter, who was introduced by the plaintiff, that he saw the plaintiff's intestate at Hurricane; that he got up on his engine, and set his lantern down, about 5 o'clock in the morning on the 12th day of August, by standard time, which is twenty-four minutes faster than sun time, and according to the evidence it would take about twelve minutes to run from Hurricane to the bridge. When the bridge was reached, then, it lacked twelve minutes by sun time of being 5 o'clock; and the court will take judicial cognizance of the fact that on the 12th of August, 1886, the sun arose at that place at seven minutes after 5 o'clock, so that it lacked about nineteen minutes of sunrise at the time said freight train passed under said bridge. He did not need his lantern, for the engineer, Poindexter, testifies that he left it sitting on the engine. He also states that it was a damp, cloudy morning; that the bridge was on a straight line, and, going west, it could be seen for half a mile. Mr. Keasel, who was a fireman on the train at the time, testifies that plaintiff's intestate said he was going on top of the car. That, as he went out, some cinders got in his eyes. He stopped and rubbed them; then came back down. Then he started back again. That nothing was said to him about going out, only he told him to look out for the overhead bridge. That he said something in reply, but witness did not know what it was. That he got up on the car, and stood for a minute in sight. Then he disappeared. And that from his position he could see a man on the cars ten or fifteen feet. That deceased was found lying about fifteen feet from the other end of the car.

As this unfortunate accident occurred in the day-time, and not at night, I do not regard the question as to whether the guards or whipping strings were in proper order at the time the injury occurred as material, because the office of these guards is to give warning of the fact that a bridge is near, when it cannot be seen; but if the question was material, it is clearly shown by the evidence of the plaintiff's witness Nugent that the guards were in proper condition at the time of the accident. It also shows that said bridge, although not a county bridge, was used by the public, and that a county road passes over it. The greater portion of the rest of the evidence bears upon the question as to whether the plaintiff's intestate came to his death by coming in contact with said bridge, and, in my view of the case, must be regarded as immaterial. The plaintiff, in his declaration, avers that the fact that the bridge under and through which said train passed was low and unsafe was unknown to said J. F. Williamson, but he utterly fails to sustain said averment by proof; while, on the contrary, said Williamson acknowledged at the time he took service from said Company that he knew that bridges, including highway bridges and tunnels on this line, were too low to clear a man standing on box cars; and at the very time he was approaching the bridge where he lost his life the witness Keasel called his attention, and told him to look out for the low bridge. How this unfortunate accident occurred must, to some extent, always remain a subject of conjecture. The evidence discloses that, when he left the engine to go on top of the cars, some cinders got in his eyes. That he stopped and rubbed them; then came back down. Then he started back again. That he got on top of the car, and stood for a minute in sight. Then he disappeared. He may have gotten more cinders in his eyes. At any rate, he was delayed in returning to the engine, and rubbing his eyes, and standing again for a minute, after he reached the top of the cars again. And all this time the train was rushing on towards the bridge on a down grade, with no brakes applied; although Mr. Poindexter, when asked, "At what point was it the duty of the brakeman to put on the brakes?" replied, "Generally about a mile beyond the bridge;" meaning, as I suppose, east of the bridge, as he was testifying in Huntington. The train was running towards the bridge, and, as a matter of course, the smoke and cinders from the engine would be between said Williamson and the bridge; and, suffering from the cinders which had lodged in his eyes, it is but natural to suppose he would turn his side or his back to the smoke, and in this manner he failed to look out for the bridge, and was prostrated by it. Be this, however, as it may, the question presented for our consideration and determination is whether, under the circumstances detailed in the evidence, the court below acted properly in sustaining the demurrer to the evidence.

In the case of Sheeler v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co., decided in 81 Va. 188, there was but one 12 L. R. A.

count in the declaration, the gravamen of which was that the deceased, a fireman in the employment of the defendant company, lost his life while in the discharge of his duty as such fireman by reason of the defendant's negligent and careless construction, at a point in the line of its road, of a bridge, the upright sides of which were not sufficiently distant from the engines and cars, when passing over the same, to allow and permit the plaintiff's intestate, as such fireman, to properly discharge his duties as fireman without incurring unreasonable risk and danger to his life and limbs; and also that by reason of the defendant's carelessness and negligence in not properly constructing said bridges, and the upright sides thereof, etc., the plaintiff's intestate, while in the faithful discharge of his duty to said defendant, was thrown against a certain bridge, and the upright sides thereof, etc., and was killed by means thereof; and it was also averred that he did not know, and had no means of knowing, of the defects and dangers of said bridge, although the same were well known to the defendant. It appears from the evidence in the case that Sheeler, without orders, and unnecessarily, got down on the side of the engine and tender, holding with his right hand a hand-holder on the engine, and holding in his left hand a small hose attached to a spigot on tender, swung his body out and forward in a stooping posture, and attempted to extinguish some greased woolen ravelings that were blazing in the box of the driving wheel, when he was struck by the side of the bridge and was killed. The court, in its opinion, says: "The settled doctrine is that 'in order to maintain an action against a railroad company for injuries received, etc., it must be proved that the injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant or its agents; and it must not appear from the evidence that want of ordinary care and prudence on the part of the person injured directly contributed to the injury.'"—referring to 17 Am. R. Rep. 253, and cases cited; also to Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Ferguson, 79 Va. 248. And the court arrived at the conclusion that said Sheeler's administrator was not entitled to recover.

In the case of Clark v. Richmond & D. R. Co., reported in 78 Va. 709, the facts are very similar to the one under consideration. Clark was employed as a brakeman on a freight train; and while in the performance of his duty on top of a car, by moonlight, he was killed by striking a highway bridge, not high enough for a man standing erect on the car-top to pass under. When he was employed he had notice of highway bridges which were too low to pass under without stooping; and on that night, leaving the station next the bridge, he was warned to look out for the bridge. On nearing the bridge, a co-brakeman, seeing him standing erect on the car-top, shouted to him to stoop; but he did not stoop. In that case, as in this, there was a demurrer to the evidence; and the court sustained the demurrer, holding that, "though defendant may have been culpable for lowness of bridge, yet Clark's carelessness contributed to the injury, and defendant was not liable;" and also that "the risk of collision with such bridges was incident to the employment. Clark had opportunity to know of their dangerous character, which must have been contemplated when he accepted employment."

In the case of Owen v. New York Cent. R. Co., 1 Lans. 108, it was held that a brakeman in the employ of a railroad company, while discharging duties in the line of his employment, upon the roof of a freight car, who was carried against a highway bridge, and sustained injuries, for which he brought an action against his employer, the bridge being three and a half feet higher than the top of the highest freight-car in use by the company, and had so remained for many years, and since the construction of the railroad, the brakeman having entered into the employment of the company with knowledge of the position and height of the bridge, and having had opportunity of informing himself as to its continuance in the same position, he should have been consulted, the danger from the bridge being clearly incident to the labor he undertook to perform; and that, "in view of the brakeman's knowledge as to the bridge, his omission to avoid the accident by stooping was such want of ordinary care and caution as would have defeated his action, if otherwise maintainable."

In Wood's Railway Law (vol. 3, p. 1481), the author says: "But where the servant knows, or ought to know, of the obstruction, he cannot recover for an injury received therefrom, because, by reason of his failure to guard against it, and neglecting to do so, he is treated as guilty of contributory negligence,"—citing Baylor v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 40 N.J. L. 28. The author also says, on the same page: "Thus, in the case last cited, a brakeman, called upon suddenly to apply the brakes to a train, was hit by the roof of a bridge over the road, and injured. The bridge was not high enough to permit a person to stand upright on the cars in passing through it, and it appeared it was not usual or customary for railroad companies to build their bridges with an elevation sufficient to enable a person to stand upright on the top of the cars in passing through them; and the court held there could be no recovery for the injury, upon the ground that the plaintiff was chargeable with knowledge of the method of building such bridges, and assumed the risk incident thereto." See Gibson v. Erie R. Co., 68 N. Y. 449, where it is held that, "where a servant enters upon employment from its nature necessarily hazardous, he assumes the usual risks and perils of the service, and also those risks which are apparent to ordinary observation. If he accepts service with knowledge of the character and position of structures from which employes might be liable to receive injury, he cannot call upon his master to make alterations to secure greater safety, or, in case of injury, hold him liable." See also the case of Rains v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co., 71 Mo. 165, third section of syllabus, where it is held: "If a brakeman knows that a foot-bridge over the railroad upon which he is employed is too low to permit a man standing erect on the top of a freight-car to pass under in safety, and nevertheless remains in the service of the company, and, while passing under the bridge on the top of a freight-car stands erect, and is killed by coming in contact with the bridge, the company is not liable." See also Pittsburgh & O. R. Co. v. Sentmeyer, 92 Pa. 276; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Stricker, 51 Md. 47.

That the plaintiff's intestate had ample opportunity to become acquainted with this portion of said railroad, and with this particular bridge, is clearly shown by the evidence. When he made application for service as freight brakeman, on the 4th of April, 1886, he was asked, "Were you ever employed by this road; where, and in what capacity?" and answered, "Yes, sir; in the year 1885, about six months as brakeman;" and P. O. Pine, a witness for plaintiff, when asked, "How long did Williamson run on this road?" answered, "I don't know; he was here twice;" and when asked, "Where did he run from?" answered, "From Huntington to Cannellton." The bridge at which it is claimed the injury was received is shown to be on the road between these two points; and Mr. Poindexter, a witness for the plaintiff, stated that he was running a freight train between Huntington and Cannellton, and, when asked how often he passed under said bridge, answered, "I couldn't say. I pass under it sometimes twice every twenty-four hours," clearly showing that employes on the freight trains between these points were not lacking in opportunity to become acquainted with this bridge. Counsel for the plaintiff in error rely upon the case of Baltimore, O. & C. R. Co. v. Rowan, 104 Ind. 88, 1 West. Rep. 914; but it is clearly apparent that that case is very different from the one at bar. The second section of the syllabus reads as follows: "Where a railroad company has constructed and maintains a bridge over its track with knowledge that it is of insufficient height, and dangerous to its employes in the discharge of their duties, it is liable to a brakeman, ignorant of the danger, who is injured while passing under such bridge in the performance of his duties." And so with the case of Kane v. Northern Cent. R. Co., 128 U. S. 91, 89 L. ed. 389. The facts in that case are very different from the case under consideration. In that case a brakeman was injured by reason of a broken step to one of the cars, which caused him to fall from the train. The plaintiff ascertained the fact that the step was broken after the cars had started, and the conductor promised to drop the car out that had the broken step during the night, but failed to do so. The cars were similar, and the plaintiff was easily deceived as to the fact whether the car with the broken step had been dropped or not; and the court held it error, on account of the peculiar facts connected with the case, to strike out the testimony from the jury.

In the case of Cooper v. Pittsburgh, O. & St. L. R. Co., 24 W. Va. 51, relied upon by counsel for plaintiff in error, while it holds that the master is bound to use ordinary care in supplying and maintaining suitable instrumentalities for the work required to be done, it also is held in that case that "the ordinary risks and perils incident to the employment, which the servant can foresee or shun or avoid or guard against by prudence, skill and forecast, are assumed by him, and they are supposed to enter into the consideration to be received by him for his services." And while it is true that in Illinois, and perhaps several other of the Western States, it has been held that it is the duty of a railroad company to so construct overhead bridges as to prevent them from being dangerous to employes walking on the top of the cars in the performance of their duties, yet the great weight of authority in Virginia, New York, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Maryland, Massachusetts and New Jersey hold in accordance with the passage above quoted from 24 W. Va., in regard to assuming the risks and perils incident to the employment; and we must hold that, by continuing in the employment of the defendant after he had every opportunity of becoming acquainted with its dangers, he assumed the risks incident thereto.

Looking, then, at the facts disclosed by the evidence in this case, and applying the rule which requires us to disregard the evidence of the defendant which is in conflict with that of the plaintiff, and admitting all that might be reasonably inferred by the jury from the evidence of the plaintiff, my conclusion is that the court below committed no error in sustaining the demurrer to the evidence, and the judgment complained of must be affirmed with costs to the defendant in error.

Hezekiah H. SMITH
v.
Hugh J. CARROLL et al.
(....R. I....)

1. Money sued for is not in the custody of the law so as to be beyond the reach of garnishment where both suits are in the same jurisdiction.
2. A plea pais darrein continuance is sufficient to set up a defense that defendant has been garnished in another suit as trustee of the plaintiff.

This is assumpsit to recover $400 in money. The action was brought in this court at the October Term, A. D. 1888. February 17, A. D. 1890, one William H. Clapp brought an action of debt on judgment for $122.74 debt and $5.65 costs, against the plaintiff, in the court of common pleas, the writ wherein was served by garnishment on the defendants for the purpose of attaching in their hands the money sued for

NOTE—Pleading; plea pais darrein continuance.

Matters occurring after plea filed can only be pleaded pais darrein continuance. Mount v. Scholes, 8 West. Rep. 686, 120 Ill. 364.

Where matter of defense has arisen after the commencement of a suit, it cannot be pleaded in bar of the action generally, but must, when it has arisen after issue joined, be by plea pais darrein continuance. Yeaton v. Lynn, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 224, 8 L. ed. 106; 1 Chitty, Pl. *689, citing Rowell v. Hayden, 40 Me. 586; Semmes v. Naylor, 12 Gill & J. 361; Bank of United States v. Van Doren, 6 Mo. 201; Wyatt v. Richmond, 4 Humpb. 365.

A fact which has arisen since the return to a mandamus was made, as a matter of defense, whether in abatement or in bar, should be set up by a plea pais darrein continuance, or its equivalent. Thompson v. United States, 106 U. S. 480, 26 L. ed. 521, citing Jackson v. Rich, 7 Johns. 194; Jackson v. Ramsay, 8 Cow. 79.

That a surety in a sheriff's bond had been compelled to pay the whole amount of his bond in other suits before judgment against him, but after the institution of the suit, is a good defense to the action if pleaded pais darrein continuance. Leggett v. Humphreys, 62 U. S. 21 How. 66, 16 L. ed. 50.

A plea pais darrein continuance is considered as a waiver of all previous pleas, and the cause of action is admitted to the same extent as if no other defense had been urged than that contained in the plea. Wallace v. McConnell, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 138, 10 L. ed. 96; Yeaton v. Lynn, 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 224, 8 L. ed. 106.

If matter in abatement is pleaded pais darrein continuance, the judgment, if against the defendant, is peremptory as well on demurrer as on trial. Renner v. Marshall, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 215, 4 L. ed. 74.

A plea pais darrein continuance setting up a release made since the general issue was pleaded is defective where it does not state the time and place in which the release was made or delivered, or the day of the last continuance, or that there ever was a continuance. Field v. Cappers, 31 Me. 33.

In the case at bar. Said action was entered in the court of common pleas at the June Term, A. D. 1890, and appealed by the defendants to this court at its present term, so that both cases are now pending in this court. The defendants have set forth these facts on the record by plea puis darrein continuance, and the plaintiff has demurred. The plaintiff contends that, after the commencement of his action, the money sued for was in the custody of the law, and no longer subject to attachment; and, furthermore, that, even if it continued to be subject to attachment, the defendants' said plea is fatally defective in form and substance, and should be overruled.

We will consider the question first presented first, namely, whether such an attachment can be supported. According to what seems to be the prevailing consent of American decision, a debt is not necessarily put beyond the reach of garnishment by being put in suit, where both suits are in the same jurisdiction. Drake, Attachment, §§ 618-621; McConn. Trustee Process, §§ 818-820.

The law, as supported by American authority, is well stated in Foster v. Dudley, 30 N. H. 463, 465. In that case the court says: "If the trustee suit be commenced while the debtor trustee has yet an opportunity to ask for delay, and to plead a recovery against him, if one should be had, he may be charged as trustee, if no other objection appears." See also McCarty v. Emlen, 2 Yeates, 190; Crabb v. Jones, 2 Miles, 180; Sweeney v. Allen, 1 Pa. 880; Thayer v. Pratt, 47 N. H. 470; Thrasher v. Buckingham, 40 Miss. 67; Lieber v. St. Louis Agr. & M. Assn. 36 Mo. 382; Smith v. Barker, 10 Me. 458; Thorndike v. De Wolf, 6 Pick. 120; Whipple v. Robbins, 91 Mass. 107.

There are cases that hold or appear to hold that, for the garnishment to be effectual, the two suits must be in the same court, as well as in the same jurisdiction. Hitt v. Lacey, 8 Ala.

104; McDonald v. Carney, 8 Kan. 20; Bingham v. Smith, 5 Ala. 651. Under this rule the garnishment here is maintainable.

The next question is as to the plea puis darrein. The purpose of the plea is to protect the defendant from liability to double payment. The Supreme Court of Vermont in Trombly v. Olark, 18 Vt. 118, 123, has said: "If a suit is pending in the name of the principal debtor, against the trustee as defendant, and the latter is summoned as trustee, he may plead this temporary bar, and stay the proceedings until the suit of the creditor against him as trustee is determined." The same view has been taken by other courts. Crawford v. Slade, 9 Ala. 887; McDonald v. Carney, supra. The plea in this view has the effect simply of a motion for continuance or for a temporary stay of proceedings; and, where the two suits are depending in the same court, the record in each being thus readily accessible to inspection, we see no reason why the result intended to be accomplished by the plea cannot be as well, if not better, accomplished by motion. It seems to be the practice in some States to resort to a motion rather than a plea. Winthrop v. Carlton, 8 Mass. 456. And see Spicer v. Spicer, 23 Vt. 678. And in this view it seems to us that the matter, whether interfered by plea or motion, need not be very strictly regarded, if only it be made to appear that justice requires a stay. We are of opinion that the plea here is sufficient for the purposes intended. It is objected that the suit, though brought in the name of the plaintiff, is prosecuted, as appears by the declaration, for Jacob Mathewson as his assignee, and that the plea does not allege any invalidity in the assignment. We think, however, that the place to try whether the assignment is valid or not is in the garnishment suit, and that the allegation is therefore unnecessary.

- *1. The giving of a credit in payment, by a debtor, does not bind third persons, unless after notice of the transfer or assignment has been given to, or acknowledged by, the party owing the credit.
2. Delivery of title suffices between transferor and transferee; but, as against third persons, possession of the credit, which is acquired only by the given notice, is essential to bind them.
3. A check is a valid instrument for the assignment of the credit of the drawer against the bank; but it does not bind the creditors of the drawer, who are third persons, unless

4. At the death of an assignor, his property passes to his creditors and heirs, the rights of the former being then fixed, not susceptible of being changed afterwards, so that one may acquire any preference over another.
5. An assignment vests an inchoate title only, so far as third persons are concerned, and, until notice to the debtor of the credit assigned has been given, the assignor's interest may be seized by his creditors and devested.
6. The law considers as third persons all the creditors of the assignor, whose property is liable to them, unless a complete divestiture has taken place previous to any action by them against it.
7. At the death of an insolvent assignor, all his rights to property in his name, not completely and absolutely assigned so as to bind third persons, pass to his insolvent succession, as fully and effectually as if he had made a voluntary surrender, which had been duly accepted.
8. A notice of a transfer of credit made after a change in the title to the property of the insolvent has thus occurred comes too late, and does not divest the rights acquired by the creditors.

9. In dation en paiement, delivery and possession are essential to operate a transfer, so as to exclude third persons. Everything doubtful or ambiguous must be interpreted against the transferee.

10. A change in the title before notice of the transfer or assignment forbids the payment by the bank to the transferee, and requires it to be made to the legal representative of the succession for distribution.

APPPEAL by the intervenor from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans disallowing her claim to a deposit made by M. S. Powell, deceased, with the defendant Bank, and which she alleged had been transferred to her. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. White & Saunders, for appellant:

The ordinary relation existing between a bank and its customer, if not complicated by any further transaction than that of the depositing and withdrawing of moneys by the customer from time to time, is simply that of debtor and creditor at common law, whether the deposit is on demand or on time.

A bank is in no sense the agent of the depositor, nor is the depositor the principal of the bank.

Foley v. Hill, 2 H. L. Cas. 27; Bank of the Republic v. Millard, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 155, 19 L. ed. 899.

On its face a check is nothing more than a written order, signed by the depositor, addressed to the bank, and directing it to pay to a person therein named, or to his order, a certain sum of money.

A written order addressed by a creditor to his debtor, directing him to pay a third person, is in legal effect nothing more nor less than a transfer and assignment of the creditor's claim to such third person.

Gray v. Trafton, 12 Mart. 704.

This is true as well of checks on banks as of other orders.

In Louisiana, whether a check is for the whole or for a part of a deposit, it amounts to an assignment.

Gordon v. Muchler, 34 La. Ann. 606; 2 Morse, Banks and Banking, § 496.

A transfer of an incorporeal right by a husband to his wife in satisfaction of his indebtedness to her is lawful.

Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2446; Succession of Webre, 35 La. Ann. 266.

The transfer by husband to wife authorized by art. 2446 is in reality a giving in payment.

Under art. 2656, a giving in payment "is made only by delivery."

In the transfer of credits, rights or claims to a third person, the delivery takes place between 13 L. R. A.

the transferor and the transferee by the giving of the title.

Art. 2642.

Succession of Webre, supra, decides that the delivery intended by the article consists in the execution and delivery of the act transferring the claim. The delivery consists in and is affected by what the parties do as between themselves at the time and in the act by which the transfer is made. Notice to the debtor is a subsequent and independent fact, not involved in the idea of delivery.

6 Marcadé, pp. 228, 224.

Assuming for the sake of the argument that the "delivery" required by art. 2656 embraces the notice to the debtor required by art. 2648, such notice is valid, if given after the transferor's death.

A check is not a mandate. A mandate postulates the relation of principal to agent. The relation of principal and agent does not exist in any sense between bank and depositor.

The death of the drawer does not invalidate a check issued for value.

Messrs. Farrar, Jonas & Kruttschnitt, for appellee:

A husband's check given to his wife, in payment of her paraphernal claims, which is not presented for payment by the wife until after the husband's death, cannot be collected by the wife after the husband's death as against the administrator of his insolvent estate. The giving of such check was not a payment, because a check is a means or instrument by which payment is to be effected when the money is procured thereon. The holder in such case becomes the agent of the drawer to collect the money.

Bermudes, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, as the administrator of the succession of M. S. Powell, brought this action to recover from the defendant the sum of $3,400, standing on its books to his credit at the time of his death, on August 21, 1885. The Bank admitted the credit, but averred that claim was laid to it by the widow of the deceased. Mrs. Powell intervened in the suit, asserting rights to the credit, in consequence of a check of her husband in her favor, given her in payment of her claims against him; which check was drawn on the 20th of August previous and presented on the 27th following to, but not honored by, the Bank, on the ground of the death of the drawer some short time before presentment. From an adverse judgment the intervenor appeals. The facts disclosed by the record are the following: On July 31, 1885, M. S. Powell deposited $3,400 with the defendant Bank, and was credited therefor. On August 20 following, being indebted to his wife in the sum of $3,500, Powell gave her a check for the entire amount to his credit in bank. On August 21, the next day, Powell died. On the 27th of August the check was presented for payment, which was declined. On behalf of the intervenor, it is contended that the relation of principal and agent did not exist between Powell and the Bank; that the relation was that of creditor and debtor; that the check imported an assignment to the payee of the creditor's claim against the Bank; that this assignment was a valid dation en paiement under art. 2446, Rev. Civ. Code; that the delivery required by article 2656 was effected by the delivery to the assignee of the check, which is the act of transfer; that if notice was required, such was validly given, although after the transferor's death, and notwithstanding his insolvency. On the other hand, it is urged that in Louisiana all contracts between husband and wife are prohibited, except those which pertain to the restitution of her dotal or paraphernal property; that a husband's check to his wife, not presented by her until after his death, cannot be collected as against the administrator of his insolvent estate; that such a check was not a payment, a check being a means or instrument by which payment is to be effected when the money is procured thereon; that the holder, in such case, becomes the agent of the drawer to collect the money; that the death of the principal revokes the agency of both the Bank and the holder, the vehicle being destroyed; that delivery is of the essence of the giving in payment, and that there was none; that it is against public policy that an insolvent and defaulting public official should be allowed to make a preferred creditor of his wife, by transferring to her a large portion of his estate, she being aware at the time that he was a defaulter and an insolvent.

It would serve no useful purpose to undertake to discuss and determine all the complicated, broad and difficult issues thus presented by the litigants. Authorities are not wanting to sustain many of the conflicting positions by them respectively assumed. The question presented for solution is, after all, the following one only: Whether the drawing of a check by an insolvent, delivered by him to a creditor in payment of a claim, operates an assignment in his favor, such as entitles him to receive the amount as assignee, when claimed after the drawer's death, and without any previous presentment or certification. In other words, whether the condition of things existing during the drawer's life was or was not changed at his death, and, if it was, whether the change does or does not prevent the checkholder from recovering the amount of the check.

The contention of the intervenor, strictly, is that she was a creditor of Powell; that the check was given by him to her in payment; that this giving operated in her favor an assignment and transfer of the amount to his credit; that, by the title thus furnished to her, the credit was delivered to her, and that this delivery included the possession, if any be required by law; that this condition of things existed at his death, and that the fact of his dying insolvent in no way impaired her acquired rights. It is clear that, being at the time a creditor of her husband, she could receive payment from him of her claim against him, and that, when he issued and delivered to her the check in question, he intended to give her, and she consented to receive, in payment of what was due her the amount to his credit in the Bank. There was then an assignment made to her of his credit or right to that amount, and she held the check for a valid consideration. The "giving in payment" in Louisiana is an act by which a debtor gives a thing to the creditor, who is willing to receive it in payment of a sum which is due. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2655. By the same law, that "giving of payment" is perfect only when followed by delivery. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2656. In the transfer of credits, the delivery takes place between transferor and transferee by the giving of the title. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2642. The transferee of a credit, says the Code, is only possessed, as regards third persons, after notice has been given to, or accepted by, the debtor, that the transfer had taken place. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2643. The check given by Powell to his wife was not the thing given in payment. In itself it was a worthless piece of paper, unless filled, signed and honored according to the purpose in view by the parties concerned. That which was intended to be given in payment was not any money in bank of Powell, for he had none there, on special deposit, or separate and apart in his name, which he could order to be delivered in kind; but was his claim to the amount standing to his credit on the books of the Bank, and which the latter owed him for as much which he had deposited as a loan with it, subject to payment on call. It has therefore been frequently held that the giving of a check for an antecedent debt is not an absolute payment and extinguishment of the debt, in the absence of an express agreement giving it that effect. Ordinarily, it is only a means of payment, and the debt will not be extinguished unless and until the check is paid. 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. 688; 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, Checks, 218. The evidence shows that it was some six or seven days after the death of Powell that the check was first presented to the Bank, and payment asked, which was refused, on account of the death. It is certain that, before that event, the Bank had received or accepted no notice that the check had been drawn, or that the credit had been transferred either from Mr. or Mrs. Powell. Surely, had the check been presented before the death, it could and would have been paid; but the dominant question remains, whether, after that event, it should have been honored.

The able counsel for the intervenor, well aware of the tenderness and difficulty of the position here, says: "The sole test is whether any creditor of the assignor, or any other assignee, has acquired a right on the credit transferred." So that the contention is narrowed down to the solitary inquiry, whether or not, at the moment of the death, any creditor of the assignor, or any other assignee, has acquired a right on the credit. It is clear that had the check been presented before the death, but after the credit had been drawn against, or validly seized by judicial authority, in satisfaction of an undisputable claim, or had Powell become a judicially declared insolvent, to the Bank's knowledge, Mrs. Powell could not have been paid at all, because there would have then existed no claim which Powell could have enforced against the Bank, and because Mrs. Powell, transferee, could have had in the matter no greater right than he possessed. Now, it is well settled in the jurisprudence of this State that the rights of creditors are fixed at the debtor's death, and that no one can subsequently get any advantage over others. It is likewise well established that a debtor's property is the common pledge of his creditors. Under those just and equitable rules, all the titles which Powell had to any property, standing in his name, not divested so as to bind third parties, passed to his succession, represented by both his creditors and his heirs, if any of the latter, as effectually as if he had made a voluntary surrender, which had been accepted. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 871; Rev. Stat. § 1791. The intervenor nevertheless claims that under the settled jurisprudence of this State, as the sale of a movable or the transfer of a credit may be perfected as to creditors, after declared insolvency, it may be perfected after death, in case of actual insolvency of the succession, and the creditors and heirs are then as strictly bound by the obligations of the deceased after, as they were before, the death. In support of this bold proposition reference is made to three cases, viz.: Campbell v. Slidell, 5 La. Ann. 274; Nicolopulo v. His Creditors, 37 La. Ann. 474; Hall v. Mulholland, 7 La. 389.

It is perfectly true that, in those cases, the purchasers were recognized as owners of property sold before the cession or surrender, although in the first the act of sale of an interest in real estate had not been previously recorded, and in the others delivery or possession had not followed the sale of the movables before the declared insolvency. It must not be forgotten that we are not presently concerned with a sale, but with a "giving in payment," and that the principles which govern in one do not rule in the other. The Code distinctly declares (Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2656) "that giving in payment differs from the ordinary contract of sale, in this: that the latter is perfect by the mere consent of the parties, even before delivery, while the giving in payment is made only by delivery." It also says, on the subject of the assignment of credits, that although delivery takes place between transferrer and transferee by the giving of title (Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2642), the transferee is only possessed, as regards third persons, after notice has been given to the debtor of the transfer having taken place, or he has accepted the transfer by an authentic act. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2643.

In the case of Gordon v. Muchler, 84 La. Ann. 604, in which a sum to the credit of the defendant was claimed by three parties,—(1) the bank in which the deposit had been made; (2) another bank which held a check against it, which had been presented but not paid; (3) a creditor who had attached after the presentment of the check,—this court held that the first claimant was not entitled to it, because it would not plead compensation against it; that the attaching creditor could not recover; because the seizure had been effected too late, s. a., after the presentment; and the court allowed the amount to the bank which held the check, because the check had operated as an assignment, perfected by notice, in the form of the presentment of it. In thus holding, the court said: "Our law, differing therein from the common law, distinctly recognizes the assignability of that class of incorporeal rights known at common law as 'choses in action,' and provides for the perfectibility of such assignments by notice to the debtor, and entirely independent of his consent. . . ."

This clearly recognizes and establishes, in cases of checks drawn against a credit in bank, that, although the check may be an assignment by the drawer in favor of the drawee, that assignment is perfect and absolute as to third parties only when the check has been presented and payment asked, even independent of the consent of the bank on which drawn. It is the settled and unbending jurisprudence of this State that the assignment of an incorporeal right vests only an inchoate title, and that until notice to the debtor the assignor's interest may be seized by his creditors. 2 Hen. Dig. p. 1882, VIII. (b) 1. The law considers as third persons all the creditors of the assignor whose property is liable to them till a complete transfer and tradition to the assignee. Oax v. White, 2 La. 425. The transfer of a draft, in order to be binding on third persons, must be made by delivery of the draft to the transferee, and by notice to the debtor of the transfer. Hill v. Hanney, 15 La. Ann. 654; Louq. Dig. p. 641, (b) 1. Delivery is of the very essence of a dation en paiement, and, in such cases, everything doubtful or ambiguous must be interpreted against the creditor. Groves v. Steel, 3 La. Ann. 280. Until notice of the transfer of a claim has been given to the debtor, such claim, though transferred, is liable to attachment by the creditors of the transferrer. Golsan v. Powell, 83 La. Ann. 521; Frolsen v. Witkowski, 40 La. Ann. 273. When Powell died, all his rights and obligations were transmitted to his legal representatives, who were apparently his creditors (as he was thoroughly insolvent), and his heirs, if any. Rev. Civ.

Code, art. 871 et seq. Those representatives acquired by his death something besides rights which he could not have asserted had he not died, among which was that of undoing seasonably any illegal acts done by him, to their injury, even by resorting to parol proof, when he would have been estopped or required to produce only by written evidence; likewise that of resisting the effect of a mortgage consented to by him, but not recorded before his death or failure. Rev. Civ. Code, arts. 8362, 8363. It will not do, in order to avoid these propositions, to say that the property passed from the deceased to his legal representatives cum onere, because that is a begging of the question, for the reason that, in the instant case, under the special provisions of our law, the giving in payment was an absolute nullity, as regards third persons, inasmuch as the check had not been presented, or no notice of the transfer of credit had been given, before the death.

It was emphatically held in the celebrated case of Tate v. Hilder, 2 Ves. Jr. 112, in which the question presented related to the effect of the death of the drawer of a check presented after his demise, that, at the instant of the death, the title vested in his legal representatives, and his own order was no longer competent to withdraw any part of that which was no longer his property. The French authorities invoked by the intervenor are to the effect that the notice given after a judicially declared insolvency is of no avail; also that, in cases of sale, the contract may be perfected, even without previous delivery after surrender; also that notice may be given after death in cases of an acceptance by the heirs under benefit of inventory; but they do not establish authoritatively that, in cases of insolvent successions, the title of the deceased to credits given in payment does not vest in the creditors, as in cases of judicial surrenders. It is to be noted that, while Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2642 et seq., were borrowed from the French Code, the subsequent article (Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2656) is not to be found in it, and was inserted in our legislation, obviously to differentiate, to some extent, between the two systems in this respect. The title which Mrs. Powell claims to hold to the credit may have been good evidence of the transfer, and binding, without notice to the Bank, on Powell and his heirs; delivery being sufficient, and possession not being essential as to them (Hall v. Mulholland, 7 La. 889; Lee v. Cameron, 14 La. Ann. 700; Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2642); but as to third persons, creditors being such, it surely was barren of all effect, for the reason that the transfer or assignment of the credit could not, under our law, which differs from the common law, have bound them, unless notice to the debtor, the Bank, had been duly and seasonably given, or he had acknowledged them before the death. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2648. Delivery is one thing, and suffices in one instance. Possession is another, and is essentially required in another.

While ruling as we do, we are not to be understood as holding that the death of Powell revoked the check delivered by him to his wife, who is not a third person, for the assignment thereby made is binding between him and her, nor as holding that a third person holding it would not be entitled to collect it. What we decide is simply that such assignment not having been notified before his death, he dying thoroughly insolvent, a change has taken place as to the title of the credit, which, at the moment of death, has passed to the mass of his creditors, who are third parties, not bound without notice of the assignment; consequently that, by such change, Powell was dispossessed for the benefit of his creditors, and that his order to pay, given before his death, cannot be executed as to them after that event has occurred. Had he died solvent, quite a different state of things would be presented, and this case would not have arisen; for it would have been immaterial to the heirs, as the debt existed, with what money it would have to be paid. It therefore follows that, as the check was not presented, paid or certified before the death, or that notice of the transfer of the credit has been given after that same event, a change in the title then occurred, and that the transfer is barren of effect as to the creditors of the insolvent assignor; that the credit belongs to his succession; and the amount which the Bank owes, as standing in Powell's name, must be paid, not to the intervenor, but to the administrator of his succession, for distribution according to law. The district court thought that the credit had not been transferred so as to prevent the legal representatives of Powell from acquiring title to it, and, in so finding, it has correctly applied the law to the facts.

Fenner, J., dissenting:

The value of legal principles consists in their practical application. We have held that a check operates as an assignment of the fund upon which it is drawn, perfect, as between the drawer and payee, from the moment of delivery, and binding on the bank as soon as it is notified thereof by the presentment of the check. Gordon v. Muchler, 84 La. Ann. 604; Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 1638, 1643. This entirely removes the case from the application of those authorities which are based on the contrary principle, that a check is a mere mandate, revocable by the drawer, and not binding on the bank until accepted by the latter. All authorities, which hold the view taken by this court, agree, as a logical consequence, that the death of the drawer operates no change in the rights of the parties. Mr. Morse says: "It is perfectly clear that, where a check operates as an assignment, the death of the drawer will not revoke it. Whether it be with or without consideration, a right, once vested, cannot be divested by the death of the party from whom it was acquired." Morse, Banks and Banking, § 400. Mr. Daniel says: "The idea that the death of the drawer of a check, given to a payee for value, operates a revocation, is, as it seems to us, a total misconception of the law."

The drawer is deemed the principal debtor, and it is anomalous to hold that his death in any wise lessens his obligations, or the right of the bank to pay it, when given for value." Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1618, and note. Prof. Parsons takes the same view: "The right on the part of the drawee to complete the assignment would seem to be a privilege of his own, and it is somewhat difficult to see how the death of the drawer can affect it." 2 Parsons, Notes and Bills, 287, note. In the case of Gordon v. Muchler, above cited, we assimilated a check to the transfer or assignment of an incorporeal right, saying: "It will not be disputed that a written order by a creditor, addressed to a debtor, directing him to pay to a third person a debt due to the former, accompanied by due notice to the debtor, would comply with all the requirements imposed by our Civil Code, arts. 2642-2654, for the valid giving of title, delivery and complete assignment of the credit or incorporeal right referred to in the order. The check, its presentation, protest and the written notice herein given, unequivocally fulfill all these requirements." If the death of the drawer of the check would operate to destroy the right of the payee to perfect his assignment by giving notice to the bank, the death of the assignor of any other incorporeal right would have a like effect. There is certainly no authority for such a proposition in our jurisprudence; and the French courts and commentators agree that the death of the assignor of an incorporeal right has no such effect, and that, notwithstanding the same, the assignee preserves intact his right to perfect his assignment by giving notice to the debtor. Journal du Palais, 1837, 1, p. 431; Id. 1841, 2, p. 715; 24 Laurent, No. 494; 4 Aubry & R. p. 429. A reference to these authorities will show that all the reasons assigned in the majority opinion, touching the intervention of the rights of creditors as resulting from the death, etc., are considered and disposed of. They also refer to article 8363 of our Code (Code Nap. 2146), which refuses effect to mortgages inscribed after the death, as declaring an exceptional principle not to be extended beyond its terms, and hold that the failure to make such provision, with reference to notice of assignment of incorporeal rights, exempts the latter from a like regulation. I do not think the provisions of our law on the subject of giving in payment have any application. They apply to the giving in payment of things other than money. A check is an order for the payment of money, and is a mere vehicle or process for affecting a payment in money. Moreover, I think the delivery referred to in article 2656 is the delivery, as between the transferrer and transferee, which, under article 2642, takes place "by the giving of title." I dissent.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

ELYTON LAND CO., Appt.,

v.

BIRMINGHAM WAREHOUSE & ELEVATOR CO. et al.

(.....Ala.....)

Payment of stock subscriptions amounting to $300,000 by a bond for title to land on which only $5,000 had been paid, and which was worth no more than the subscribers had agreed to pay for it, the company assuming the purchase-money notes, leaves the subscribers liable to creditors of the corporation for the difference between the actual value of their interest in the land and the amount of their subscriptions where the State Constitution prohibits the issue of stock except for money or property actually received, and statutes require payments by property to be at its money value.

(May 1, 1891.)

APPREAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Jefferson County sustaining demurrers to a bill filed to collect a corporation debt from stockholders whose stock subscriptions were alleged to remain unpaid. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Alexander T. London, for appellant:

Subscriptions to the capital stock of a corporation constitute a trust fund for the benefit of creditors, which neither the corporation, nor its directors, can dispose of or waste to their prejudice, and any agreement to that effect is void against creditors.

Smith v. Huckabee, 58 Ala. 191; Montgomery & W. P. R. Co. v. Branch, 59 Ala. 189; Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 60, 28 L. ed. 229; Scott v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 148, 26 L. ed. 968.

Creditors may enforce this liability.

Taylor, Priv. Corp. 660; Cook, Stock and Stockholders, § 42; Smith v. Huckabee and Scott v. Thayer, supra.

Where property is transferred in payment of subscriptions, it must be at its fair cash value.

Where the over-valuation of land or property transferred in payment of stock subscriptions is so great as to bear evidence on its face that it was intentional and fraudulent, the court will hold, unless the transaction is reasonably explained, that there is no question of fact, but as a matter of law the over-valuation was fraudulent.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill was filed by the Elyton Land Company as a judgment creditor of the Birmingham Warehouse & Elevator Company, a corporation, and its purpose is to secure the payment of the judgment by the enforcement of the alleged unsatisfied liability of the individual defendants as original subscribers to the stock of the defendant corporation. It is averred that said individual defendants pretend that they have discharged and satisfied their liability as such subscribers, but it is alleged that the transaction whereby it was attempted to discharge that liability is merely colorable, and is void as against the creditors of said corporation, and that said subscribers are liable to pay in money the amount of their said subscriptions, or so much thereof as is necessary to satisfy said judgment. The following is the substance of the case stated by the bill:

On the 9th day of March, 1887, the Elyton Land Company executed and delivered to defendant J. A. Van Hoose, as trustee for the Birmingham Warehouse & Elevator Company, a corporation then in process of organization, its bond of title for two blocks of land near the City of Birmingham, to be paid for at the price of $53,000. Said Van Hoose paid to the Elyton Land Company $5,000 on the execution and delivery of the bond for title, by the terms of which it was provided that he was to execute a transfer and conveyance of his rights and interests thereunder to the Birmingham Warehouse & Elevator Company, upon its organization, and that that Company should make its nine notes for the balance of the purchase money to the Elyton Land Company, said notes to be each for $5,388.83, bearing interest from August 20, 1886, payable, respectively, at 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9 years from that date. On the 19th day of February, 1887, said Van Hoose and the other individual defendants, Johnston, Sage and McLester, filed their petition in the office of the probate judge of Jefferson County for the organization as a corporation of the Birmingham Warehouse & Elevator Company, the capital stock of which was to be fixed at $250,000, to be divided into 2,500 shares of $100 each. On the same day a commission was issued to said Van Hoose, Johnston, Sage and McLester, constituting them a board of corporators, and authorizing them to open books of subscription to the capital stock of the proposed corporation. On the 11th day of March, 1887, said board of corporators, over their signatures, reported and certified to said probate judge that on the 9th day of March, 1887, they had opened books of subscription to the stock of said proposed corporation, and that they had each subscribed for 500 shares, "subscribed through James A. Van Hoose, trustee for the subscribers, and payable in real property near the City of Birmingham, of the money value stated in said subscription of $250,183.83, subject to the unpaid purchase money due to the Elyton Land Company, amounting to $50,183.83, the payment of which is to be assumed by said Company, said lands being fully described in the bond for titles of the Elyton Land Company to said James A. Van Hoose, trustee, dated March 9, 1887, which said trustee is to convey to said Company in payment of said two thousand shares of stock," and Van Hoose, Johnston and McLester each subscribed for one share, payable in money. Said corporators further reported that on the organization of said Company said Van Hoose, Johnston, Sage and McLester were present, and each represented in person 501 shares in stock; that each of said persons was elected a director of said corporation, and that the board of directors elected Van Hoose as president and McLester as treasurer and secretary of the corporation. It was further reported and certified by the corporators that on the 10th day of March, 1887, after the organization of said Company, all the capital stock thereof payable in money was paid to the treasurer, and all the property subscribed was delivered to him. The subscriptions were made as reported, and certified by the corporators. It was not true at the time of the filing of the bill, or when the subscriptions were made and reported, that said land was of the money value of $200,000. The price named in said bond for title—$53,000—was at the time of said subscription the full money value of said land when sold on long credit. Said Van Hoose, Johnston, Sage and McLester well knew that said land was not worth, nor was it of the money value of, $200,000, or anything near that sum. After said subscriptions were made, and after said Birmingham Warehouse & Elevator Company was organized, said Van Hoose indorsed to it said bond for title, and said Company executed its nine promissory notes, as by the terms of the bond for title it was provided it should do; and said Van Hoose, Johnston, Sage and McLester now claim that the assignment of said bond was a discharge and satisfaction of said subscription of $200,000, which has not been otherwise paid. It is this transaction which the bill alleges is merely colorable and is void as against the creditors of said corporation. Only $5,000 has been paid on account of said purchase money. The Elyton Land Company has recovered judgment against said Birmingham Warehouse & Elevator Company on two of said notes. That judgment remains unsatisfied, and said corporation has no property out of which it could be satisfied by execution.

Each of the individual defendants demurred to the bill upon the following, among other, grounds: (1) That the bill on its face shows that the complainant has no right to the relief therein prayed because it shows that this defendant owes nothing to the Birmingham Warehouse & Elevator Company, either in unpaid subscriptions for stock or otherwise; (2) because said bill alleges no facts which render this defendant liable personally in any way for the alleged debt mentioned therein as due from said Birmingham Warehouse & Elevator Company to the complainant; and (3) because said bill shows that this defendant subscribed for stock in said Birmingham Warehouse & Elevator Company, payable in property, at a valuation mentioned in said subscription, which property has been delivered and received in full payment for said stock; and said bill fails to show that said property was over-valued unreasonably, intentionally and fraudulently, or that the defendant has made a profit from the stock so subscribed and taken by him. A decree was rendered sustaining the demurrers as to the grounds here mentioned. The appeal is from that decree.

On the averments of the bill it is to be taken as true that the property which was received by the corporation as full payment of the stock subscription was worth only $5,000, the amount which had been paid on the bond for title. It follows that the decree of the chancery court involves the assertion of the validity as against the creditors of the corporation of the payment of a stock subscription of $200,000 by the transfer to the corporation of property worth only $5,000. In reviewing this determination regard is to be had to certain constitutional and statutory provisions which are to be construed and applied in the light of settled principles governing the relations of stockholders to the corporation of which they are members, and to the creditors thereof. By the Constitution of 1875 it was provided that "no corporation shall issue stock or bonds, except for money, labor done, or money or property actually received; and all fictitious increase of stock or indebtedness shall be void;" and that "dues from private corporations shall be secured by such means as may be prescribed by law, but in no case shall any stockholder be individually liable otherwise than for the unpaid stock owned by him or her." Sections 6, 8, art. 14, of the Constitution. Prior to the adoption of the present Constitution each stockholder in any corporation was liable to the amount of stock held or owned by him, the law imposing a liability not only to the extent that the stock was unpaid, but for an additional sum equal to the amount of such stock. Section 8, art. 18, of the Constitution of 1868; section 1760, Rev. Code 1867; McDonnell v. Alabama G. L. Ins. Co. 85 Ala. 401.

Before the creation of this additional liability the stock and other property of a private corporation was regarded and treated in a court of equity as a trust fund for the payment of the debts of the corporation, and in the event of the insolvency of the corporation unpaid stock subscriptions could be condemned for the satisfaction of the creditors; and said additional liability was a mere increase of the security for the payment of the corporate debt. Smith v. Huckabee, 58 Ala. 191.

While corporate creditors were secured by this special liability existing in their favor there was no direct constitutional or general statutory prohibition against the abuse of corporate powers by the issue of stock not in good faith representing the value of money, service or property actually contributed to the corporate enterprise; and the general Incorporation Law then in force contained no requirements as to the mode of subscribing for stock, or as to how the subscription liability should be satisfied. Code 1867, chaps. 3, 4, title 2, pt. 2. The dangers to which corporate creditors were exposed by the absence of such regulations were obviated by the provisions for said additional liability. When those provisions were repealed by the Constitution of 1875 there was an obvious necessity of providing that the trust fund, the remaining security for corporate creditors, should exist as a thing of substance, and that the liability for unpaid stock should not be merely illusory. This necessity was not overlooked. The former legislative policy of securing corporate creditors by making the stockholders liable to them in amounts over and above what they could be called upon to pay on their stock subscriptions gave place to a new policy, the aim of which was to afford proper security to persons dealing with corporations by prohibiting the issue of stock except for value received by the corporation, and by providing definite regulations for the payment of stock subscriptions in money, or in labor or property at its money value. This new policy is evidenced generally by section 6, art. 14, of the Constitution, quoted above, and particularly as to manufacturing, mining, immigration and industrial business corporations, by section 1805 of the Code of 1876, which provides that "all subscriptions to the capital stock of any company organized or proposed to be organized under the provisions of this article shall be made payable in money, or in labor or property at its money value, to be named in the list of subscriptions; and in case of a failure to perform the labor, or deliver the property, according to the terms of the subscription, the money value thereof as named in the list of subscription shall be paid by the subscribers." These enactments are not for the benefit of corporate creditors alone. The policy evidenced thereby bears upon the relations of corporations to the public and upon the relations of stockholders to each other, to the corporation and to its creditors.

This court has not heretofore had occasion to pass upon the question as to the effect of these provisions upon the rights of corporate creditors. The effective operation of the constitutional provision in other connections has been recognized in several cases.

In Fitzpatrick v. Dispatch Pub. Co., 88 Ala. 604, it was held, at the instance of an objecting stockholder, that under the constitutional and statutory provisions a corporation with a paid-up capital of $10,000 has no authority to double its capital stock and distribute the new stock among its stockholders as a stock dividend, on the mere statement that its capital stock "has been invested in property which has more than doubled in value, and is now worth $20,000 over and above all liabilities;" and an injunction was issued to restrain and enjoin the corporation from carrying into effect a resolution which had been adopted by the stockholders for the issue and distribution of such new stock. In the course of the opinion it was said: "Let us not, by timid interpretation, impair the strength of this bulwark, erected by our constitution makers against the frauds which have become the reproach of the age we live in."

In Williams v. Evans, 87 Ala. 725, 6 L. R. A. 218, it was held that relief could not be granted on an executory contract to pay for the transfer of a subscriber's right under a stock subscription whereby it was provided that the corporation to be formed should issue "five dollars of stock for one dollar of subscription." The stock had not been issued when the contract in suit was made. The court said: "A contract which contemplates the violation of a statute or a constitution as a mode of executing such contract is illegal and void. . . . One of the purposes of this clause of the Constitution was to protect the public, as well as stockholders, against spurious and worthless stock by the process of watering; in other words, from fraudulently issuing and putting on the market fictitious corporate stock, which is based on nothing valuable as a consideration for its issue. It is greatly to the interest of the public that the policy of this provision should be enforced." In Parson v. Joseph (Ala.), decided during the present term, and reported in 8 So. Rep. 788, the bill, to which a demurrer was overruled, was filed by a stockholder to secure the cancellation of certain certificates of stock issued to another stockholder, on the ground that the stock so issued was fictitious, and that its issue was in violation of the Constitution and the statute law of the State. It was alleged that certain stock was paid for in full by conveying to the company thirty-nine acres of land at an agreed price and valuation of $187 per acre, when the land was not worth more than $25 per acre; that afterwards the capital stock of the company was doubled, and without further consideration than the thirty-nine acres of land the amount of stock issued therefor was doubled. The contention was in regard to this latter issue of stock. It was alleged that the excessive valuation of the land was made knowingly, willfully and with the fraudulent intent of having the fictitious stock in question issued in violation of law. On these averments it was held that the stock in question was issued in violation of section 1663 of the Code of 1886, and of section 6, art 14, of the Constitution. It is to be observed that the respective requirements of section 1805 of the Code of 1876 and section 1662 of the Code of 1886, as to how stock subscriptions shall be payable, differ in this: that the former requires the subscriptions to be made payable in money, or in labor or property at its money value, to be named in the list of subscription; while the latter provides that all subscriptions must be payable in money; but the commissioners may receive subscriptions payable in money, the subscriber having the privilege of discharging the same by the rendition of stipulated necessary services, or the performance of stipulated necessary labor for the corporation, at the reasonable value of such services or labor, or in property at the reasonable value thereof. It does not seem, however, that the variations in the terms of these two Statutes are such that the fact that the stock subscription was made under the one or the other of them would make any substantial difference in the right of a stockholder to object to the issue of other stock representing property received by the corporation at an excessive and fraudulent overvaluation. In the case last cited it was suggested that stockholders who knowingly and intentionally have subscribed and paid for stock with property upon a fictitious valuation are liable to creditors as stockholders who have not paid up in full for their stock; but the question of such liability was not presented in that case.

In Tutwiler v. Tuscaloosa O. I. & L. Co., 89 Ala. 391, several questions that might arise from the issue of stock for property taken at a palpably excessive valuation were stated, but not decided. It is plain from this review of the decisions that the constitutional and statutory provisions in question are treated as effectual to prevent the courts from lending their aid for the enforcement of any contract or obligation the execution of which involves a disregard of those regulations, and that, so far as they are appropriate for the protection of stockholders from improper discriminations in accepting payments for stock, those regulations are accorded such effect and operation as to fully accomplish this purpose of their enactment. It cannot be doubted that the protection of the interests of corporate creditors is as much within the aim and policy of those regulations as were the objects in behalf of which they have been successfully invoked in this court.

In considering the claim of corporate creditors to hold the stockholders of the corporation individually liable on the ground that an attempt by them to satisfy their stock subscriptions by the transfer to the corporation of property at a gross overvaluation was not such payment as the law requires, the fact is not to be lost sight of that the solution of the question is dependent in some measure at least upon the constitutional and statutory provisions which the court has already construed as amply effectual to secure the accomplishment of other objects, also within the purview of the enactments; and it may be added that a like beneficial operation should be accorded to these provisions when invoked in furtherance of either of their manifest purposes. It is impossible to reconcile the decisions of the various courts upon the question of the liability to the creditors of the corporation of stockholders on stock issued for property taken at an overvaluation. We will briefly consider the cases principally relied on in support of the proposition that such liability cannot be maintained.

In Cott v. North Carolina Gold Amalgamating Co., 119 U. S. 848, 80 L. ed. 420, the liability was claimed on the ground that the stock was paid for in property at a valuation illegally and fraudulently made at an amount far above its actual value. The court found that this claim was not sustained by the evidence. It was said in the opinion: "The incorporators may have placed too high an estimate upon the property, but the court below finds that its valuation was honestly and fairly made; and there is only one item—the value of the charter privileges—which is at all liable to any legal objection. But if that were deducted the remaining amount would be so near the aggregate capital that no implication could be raised against the entire good faith of the parties in the transaction." It is plain that this case is not an authority against the existence of the liability contended for by appellant.

In Brant v. Ehlen, 59 Md. 1, there was no assertion of the absence of such liability. It was expressly stated in the opinion that the questions presented were dealt with upon the assumption that the sale and purchase of the land which was paid for in stock were made in good faith. Another case, decided subsequently, and reported in the same volume,—Crawford v. Rohrer, 59 Md. 599,—shows clearly the rule prevailing in that State on the subject under consideration. In that case it was decided that "any arrangement among stockholders, or those in charge of the affairs of the corporation, by which the stock is but nominally paid for, whether in money or property, the corporation not in fact getting the benefit of the price in good faith, will be regarded as a sham, and not as a valid payment, as against the creditors of the corporation, however it may be regarded as between the corporation and the subscriber."

In Carr v. Le Fevre, 27 Pa. 418, a stockholder was sought to be charged on stock which had been paid for in land. It was said in the opinion: "There is nothing in the special verdict tending to show that there was any fraud in this transaction;" and that "the parties took the precaution to have the lands valued and appraised. We are bound to presume that this was fairly done." The element of gross overvaluation was lacking in that case. In this particular it was like the Alabama case of Davis v. Montgomery Furnace & Co., decided during the present term, and reported in 8 So. Rep. 486.

In Van Cott v. Van Brunt, 82 N. Y. 535, it appeared that stock and bonds of a railroad company were issued to a contractor for the building of the road, and that the work done under the contract was of less value than the par of the stock and bonds agreed to be paid therefor. By this arrangement the stock was disposed of in good faith, and without fraud, though for less than its face value. It was held that the liability of the stockholder had been discharged. On page 542 of the opinion it is made to appear that the transaction was without the influence of statutes in that State somewhat similar to provisions prevailing here, as will be shown by references to be made to other New York decisions. This case has several times been made the subject of unfavorable comment. Taylor, Priv. Corp. 2d ed. § 545, note 5; 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 896; Cook, Stock and Stockholders, § 47, note 5; Jackson v. Traer, 64 Iowa, 488.

Phelan v. Hazard, 5 Dill. 45, was a suit by a creditor to charge a transferee of stock, who had purchased the same for value, and in good faith, as full-paid stock. It was said that a liability could not be established against the defendant by showing that the property conveyed to the corporation in payment for the stock was not worth the amount of the stock, or that it was not worth anything over and above the mortgages upon it at the time of the transfer. The court held that the agreement whereby property was received in payment for the stock was conclusive upon the company and its creditors, until by direct attack it has been impeached and rescinded for fraud; and it was said that "the courts, even where the rights of creditors are involved, will treat that as payment which the parties have agreed should be payment." This case was followed as authority in Coffin v. Ransdell, 110 Ind. 417, 9 West. Rep. 83.

The three cases last cited represent the weight of American authority opposed to the recognition of the liability asserted in the case at bar. It is to be marked that in neither of those cases were any statutory provisions mentioned as having any bearing upon the conclusions reached. It is also to be noted that in the latter two of the three cases English decisions were principally relied on as authority. The opinions in both those cases quote with approval from Re Baglan Hall Colliery Co., L. R. 5 Ch. App. 346, where it was said, in reference to the right of a creditor to question the payment for stock by a transfer of property at an overvaluation, that "the test to be applied is this: Could the company by any proceeding have set aside the transaction?" The English rule seems to be that the creditor can have no other or greater rights in this regard than the corporation itself could assert. In this country, on the contrary, the best authorities maintain that arrangements to issue stock as full paid, though only partly paid for in fact, may be valid and binding between the company and its stockholders, and yet may be set aside at the instance of creditors, and full payment on the stock enforced for the satisfaction of the debts of the corporation. Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143, 26 L. ed. 968; Curry v. Woodward, 53 Ala. 371. This latter rule results from the doctrine, well established in America, that the stock subscribed is considered in equity as a trust fund for the payment of creditors. Wood v. Dummer, 8 Mason, 308; Montgomery & W. P. R. Co. v. Branch, 59 Ala. 139; Smith v. Huckabee, 53 Ala. 191; Paschall v. Whitsett, 11 Ala. 472; Allen v. Montgomery

R. Co. Id. 487. This doctrine first distinctly enunciated in Wood v. Dummer, supra, does not prevail in England as in this country. Taylor, Priv. Corp. § 658, note 1; Cook, Stock and Stockholders, § 42. The absence of the recognition in English cases of this trust feature of a subscription to stock renders them unsafe guides in American courts when dealing with questions relating to the liability of stockholders in reference to the debts of the corporation.

Several cases are cited in support of the contention that the provision of section 6, art. 14, of the Constitution does not have such effect on the transaction in this case as to leave the stockholders who participated therein still liable for the debts of the corporation. In Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. Dow, 120 U. S. 287, 30 L. ed. 595, it was held that a similar provision of the Constitution of Arkansas did not authorize a corporation itself to repudiate its liability on $3,600,000 in bonds and $1,800,000 in stock, both of which had been issued in payment for property worth only $1,800,000. This case involves no question of the right of creditors to charge stockholders. As has been already shown, an arrangement which would preclude the corporation from demanding further payment upon stock issued by it would not prevent creditors from proceeding against the stockholders if the stock has not really been paid for. Nothing is said in that case to indicate that the transaction would have been sustained to the same extent as against the creditors of the corporation. The case is not an authority against the existence of the liability here asserted. The same thing may be said of the case of Peoria & S. R. Co. v. Thompson, 108 Ill. 187, which is cited in the opinion in the case just mentioned. In Stein v. Howard, 65 Cal. 616, it was held that an increase of capital stock, under a resolution authorizing the additional shares to be sold at 87½ cents on the dollar, was not such "a fictitious increase of the stock" as was prohibited by a constitutional provision similar to ours. Neither in this case nor in the two cases cited just before it is there anything in the report to indicate what, if any, statutory regulations prevailed in those States in reference to the mode in which subscriptions to stock in corporations should be made payable.

We will now turn to the principal cases which assert the invalidity as against creditors of attempts to satisfy the liability on stock subscriptions by the transfer of property at a gross overvaluation. In Jackson v. Traer, 64 Iowa, 469, the facts were that a railway company had been indebted to a construction company in the sum of $70,000, which it was unable to pay; and in satisfaction of the debt it issued to the construction company certificates of stock of the face value of $350,000, which shares were distributed among the members of the construction company. It was held that such members were to be treated as stockholders who had paid 20 per cent on their stock, the stock held by them being five times greater in amount than the debt for which it was issued, and that they were liable to a creditor of the corporation to the extent of the unpaid 80 per cent of the par value of the stock. To the same effect is Osgood v. King, 42 Iowa, 478. In neither of 12 L. R. A.

these cases does it appear that the statutes of Iowa require subscriptions to stock to be made payable in any particular mode. The existence of the liability was not made to depend upon a statutory requirement in this regard. By the New York Statute governing the organization of corporations for manufacturing purposes it is provided "that the trustees of such companies may in good faith purchase property necessary to their business, and issue stock to the amount of the value thereof in payment therefor, and the holders of such stock are exempt from liability for the debts of the corporation." In Douglass v. Ireland, 78 N. Y. 100, it appeared that the capital stock of the corporation organized under that Act to the amount of $800,000 was issued in consideration of the assignment to the company of executory contracts for the purchase of property found by the jury to be of the value of $68,000. The defendant acquired his stock with a full knowledge of the facts, having, as a trustee of the corporation, participated in the transaction. He was held liable as a stockholder who had not fully paid up. The court said: "A deliberate and advised overvaluation of property thus purchased and paid for is a fraud upon the law, and a violation of the condition upon which the exemption of stockholders from liability under the provisions of the statute is made to depend. It is in direct violation of the policy as well as the terms of the law which demands payment, either in money or property at its value, of all the capital stock of the company, as a condition of immunity to the stockholders from liability for debts of the corporation. The payment of an amount for property in excess of its value deprives creditors and the public of the security contemplated by the Statute, and thus a fraud is perpetrated as well upon the law as upon creditors. The fraud is consummated by the issue of stock as full paid under the Act of 1853, which has not been fully paid for in value by the property for which it is issued, and it does not depend upon any fraudulent intent other than that which is evidenced by the act of knowingly issuing stock for property to an amount in excess of its value. All that is necessary to establish the legal fraud and take the stock issued out of the immunity assured to stock honestly issued in pursuance of the Act of 1853 is to prove two facts: (1) that the stock issued exceeded in amount the value of the property in exchange for which it was issued; and (2) that the trustees deliberately and with knowledge of the real value of the property overvalued it, and paid in stock for it an amount which they knew was in excess of its actual value." The rule laid down in this case is firmly established in New York. Boynston v. Andrews, 63 N. Y. 93; Schenck v. Andrews, 57 N. Y. 133; Boynston v. Hatch, 47 N. Y. 225; Lake Superior Iron Co. v. Drexel, 90 N. Y. 87.

A New Jersey Statute authorized payment for capital stock to be made "either in money or in land; the land to be appraised by the board of directors, and taken at such value on such terms as may be agreed on." The capital stock of a corporation was fixed at $100,000, all of which was subscribed for by five persons, who became the directors of the company. Certain lands were purchased for $50,000, and the deed thereto was made directly to the corporation, which gave its obligations for the whole of the purchase money. The directors then appraised the lands at $100,000, and credited $50,000 of that valuation as a payment of 50 per cent on their stock subscriptions. The lands were not worth more than the original purchase price. On this state of facts it was held, in Wetherbee v. Baker, 85 N. J. Eq. 501, that, as against creditors of the corporation, such allowance of credit on the subscriptions was invalid, and that the stockholders were liable for the whole amount of their subscriptions. In reference to the valuation of the land by the directors, as authorized by the Statute above quoted, the court says: "The directors, in making the appraisal and valuation and dealing with their stock subscriptions, act in a fiduciary capacity, and are bound to discharge the duties of the trust with fidelity. This appraisal, it is manifest, was illusory, and made only in the interest of the directors, who were to profit by it;" and that "in all such cases transactions under such powers have been upheld only where the contract for the rendition of services or the purchase of property payable in stock has been made in good faith, and the property taken in payment of stock subscriptions has been put in at a fair bona fide valuation; and the courts have inflexibly enforced the rule that payment of stock subscriptions is good as against creditors only where payment has been made in money, or in what may fairly be considered as money's worth."

In Bailey v. Pittsburg & O. G. O. & C. Co., 69 Pa. 334, the facts were that Bailey, with two other persons, on September 29th purchased certain land for $125,000, and on October 1st following the corporation agreed to take the land at an advance of $50,000, subject to the whole purchase money, so that the stock subscription of $50,000 made by Bailey and the two others should be paid for in full by the agreed advance on the land. The Statute provided that "no share shall be issued for less than its par value." It was held that by such a transaction Bailey did not pay for his stock, and that he was still liable thereon. Rights of creditors were not involved in this case. The transaction was regarded as a fraud on the rights of other stockholders, and as involving a non-compliance with statutory safeguards intended for the protection of the public. The case is not unlike the Alabama case of Parson v. Joseph, supra.

The review of the authorities will not be further extended. Discussions of them may be found in Cook, Stock and Stockholders, §§ 83-47; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 425-429; 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 825 et seq.; 2 Waterman, Corp. § 188; Taylor, Priv. Corp. §§ 545, 701 et seq. Our examination satisfies us that the weight of American authority does not support the statement made by Mr. Cook, in section 47 of his work on Stock and Stockholders, to the effect that the attempts which have been made, in cases where stock was issued for property taken at an overvaluation, to hold the party receiving such stock liable for its full par value, less the actual value of the property received from him, have been unsuccessful; and that, if there has been an overvaluation, which is shown to have been fraudulent, then the contract is to be treated like other fraudulent contracts, and is to be adopted in toto or rescinded in toto and set aside. We have found no authority at all asserting the exemption of the stockholder from such liability where it appeared that the stock subscription was governed by a statutory regulation at all similar to section 1805 of the Code of 1876, or section 1662 of the Code of 1886. On the other hand, the New York, New Jersey, Maryland and Pennsylvania decisions which have been cited show that the courts in those States, in giving effect to statutory requirements, certainly no more stringent than ours, as to the mode in which stock subscriptions shall be made payable, do not allow attempted payments in property worth greatly less than the amount of the stock issued therefor to foreclose the just demand of corporate creditors to require that the stock subscriptions be made good in money, or in money's worth, as contemplated by the statutes. Those courts recognize in such provisions safeguards intended for the protection of persons dealing with corporations as well as for the corporations themselves and the persons associated together therein. Our general laws afford the amplest and freest facilities for persons desiring to engage in almost any kind of lawful venture to secure by corporate association the advantages of defined and limited responsibility, and at the same time the efficient execution of their purposes by means of an artificial being, changes in the membership of which cause no break in the continuity of its action, nor affect its capacity to act, within the scope of its powers, as a natural person. It is plain that such associations, endowed with such powers and privileges, would be a source of danger to persons dealing with them, unless the law required that in their formation suitable provisions be made for a substantial responsibility for such engagements as they may enter into. When legal provisions are found which are appropriately framed to secure the existence of such responsibility, it is not permissible so to construe them as to allow a mere formal and illusory compliance therewith to defeat the objects intended to be accomplished. No argument is needed to show that a requirement that the stock of a corporation shall be paid in money, or in labor or property at its money value, inures to the benefit of persons who may become creditors of the corporation, in that it requires the capital stock to be the representative of substantial values, and insures the existence of a fund which must be within reach for the satisfaction of debts if the affairs of the corporation are managed as contemplated by the law. It is equally clear that if a stock subscription which is required to be made payable in money, or in labor or property at its money value, and is in fact made payable in property at a designated money valuation, may be satisfied by the transfer of property the value of which is insignificant, or merely nominal, as compared with the valuation stated, then, so far as this provision of the law looks to the protection of creditors, it might as well have allowed the subscription to be made payable in "chips and whetstones." Except section 6, art. 14, of the Constitution, and section 1905 of the Code of 1876, there were not, at the time of the formation of the appellee, in reference to the mode of satisfying stock subscriptions, adequate provisions for the protection of creditors of such corporations. Those enactments are appropriate for this purpose. The requirement of section 1905 of the Code of 1876, that "in case of a failure to perform the labor or deliver the property according to the terms of the subscription, the money value thereof, as named in the lists of subscription, shall be paid by the subscribers," cannot be regarded as providing for a penalty to compel the performance of the labor or the delivery of the property. The evident meaning is that, in the event of such failure, the corporation shall receive the equivalent, and no more nor less than the equivalent, in money, or the labor, or the property, as the case may be. This clause of the Statute is convincing that the statement of the money value of the property in which the subscription is made payable is a material feature of the contract, and that the property delivered must be of a value to correspond with that named in the subscription. As affecting the rights of creditors, the Statute is simply a definite requirement as to what shall constitute that trust fund to which persons dealing with the corporation have a right to look. The defendants in this case, in making and accepting payments on the stock subscriptions, were acting in a fiduciary capacity in reference to that fund. The performance of the contract of subscription, to be binding on creditors, should have been such as is required in the case of a contract between a trustee and one having knowledge of his trust obligation. In form the stock subscription was such as the Statute called for. Under section 2023 of the Code of 1876, and section 8, art. 14, of the Constitution the stockholders are liable only for the unpaid stock owned by them. But the creditors are entitled to demand that the payment on the stock shall be an actual and bona fide discharge of the liability imposed by the contract of subscription. The defendants, in making and accepting payment in property, were bound to exercise their judgment and discretion fairly and honestly directed to secure a substantial compliance with the terms of the contract. In the exercise of that judgment and discretion they are entitled to the benefit of whatever margin there may be for honest differences of opinion in the valuation of the property; but a deliberate and intentional overvaluation of the property is not permissible. The transfer of the property known to be worth only $5,000 to pay a stock subscription of $200,000 does not bear the semblance of a compliance with the contract of subscription as to one of the essential terms thereof. The taking of property at a valuation forty times greater than its actual worth, which was known to the parties, shows upon its face the absence of a bona fide exercise of judgment and discretion in making the valuation, and an intentional non-compliance with the requirement that the property shall be taken at its money value. The absence of the fraudulent motive on the part of a trustee does not give validity to a mere simulated execution of the trust; and an averment of fraud in reference thereto is unnecessary. The parties beneficially interested in the trust are entitled to a substantial compliance with its terms. They are not bound by an act of mere formal compliance, which really involves their practical exclusion from the benefits intended to be secured to them. The capital stock of a corporation constitutes the basis of its credit, and persons dealing with the corporation have a right to assume that the stock has been actually paid in, or that it may be reached. The transaction whereby payment was attempted to be made, as shown by the averments of the bill in this case, is not binding on creditors, because it did not constitute such a payment as was contemplated by the terms of the contract of subscription, and was in effect a palpable evasion of the requirements of the Statute. It is, however, contended in the argument for appellee that the appellant, through its officers, knew of the history of the organization of the appellee corporation, and of the mode in which the subscriptions to the stock were to be paid; that in fact it was an active promoter of the whole transaction in advance. It may be that such an unauthorized extinguishment of the subscription liability may not be impeached by one who was actively instrumental in securing the organization of a corporation with a view of making a sale of property to it, and did in fact accept benefit in dealing with the corporation with full knowledge of the arrangement by which the stock was proposed to be paid for. Disability to question a wrongful transaction usually attaches to a party who consented thereto or participated therein. Deadwood First Nat. Bank v. Gustin-Minerva Con. Min. Co. 43 Minn. 327, 6 L. R. A. 676; Bank of Fort Madison v. Alden, 129 U. S. 872, 32 L. ed. 725; Parson v. Joseph, supra; 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 829.

But the averments of the bill in this case do not show that the appellant participated in or knew of the mode in which the stock subscription was undertaken to be paid. In the absence of averments upon this subject, it is not to be taken for granted that the appellant, in making the agreement to convey the land to the corporation when formed, contemplated that the stock in the corporation should not be paid for as the law directed, or that, in accepting the notes of the corporation, it had such knowledge, and took such part in the furtherance of the acts connected with the transfer of the bond for title for the stock, that it is to be presumed to have dealt with the corporation on the basis of treating its capital stock as fully paid up. We find nothing in the averments of the bill to preclude appellant from asserting the right of a creditor of a corporation to hold stockholders liable for subscriptions to stock not really paid for. The statements of fact in the bill support the conclusions therein averred that the transaction by which payment for the stock was attempted to be made was merely colorable—in other words, that it was not really a payment—but had only the outward appearance, without the substance of payment. Such being the case, the individual defendants are still liable on their stock subscriptions to the extent that the attempted payment falls short of a bona fide compliance with the terms of the contract, and the allegations as to excessive overvaluation of the property in question were sufficient under the rules above stated. The chancery court erred in sustaining the demurrers.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Andrew L. FOLLETT, Appt.,

v.

UNITED STATES MUTUAL ACCIDENT ASSOCIATION.

(107 N. C. 341.)

1. A claim that deafness is a bodily infirmity which is covered by a representation by an applicant for accident insurance that he is free from bodily infirmities is deemed to have been waived where the insurer's agent, by personal observation, knew or had abundant opportunity to know the extent of applicant's deafness before the application was signed, notwithstanding a provision in the policy that the company's agents should have no power to waive its conditions.

2. An insurance agent's knowledge of an applicant's deafness before the signing of the application may be shown by cross-examination of the company's witnesses in a suit on the policy.

(December 1, 1890.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of nonsuit entered by the Superior Court for Durham County in an action upon a policy of accident insurance brought to recover for injuries caused by a gun-shot wound. Reversed.

Statement by Avery, J.:

This was a civil action tried at the January Term, 1890, of the Superior Court of Durham County, before Armfield, J. The plaintiff gave evidence of his injury which was shown to be accidental, and to have happened as set out in the complaint, and that his hand was amputated above the wrist, in consequence of said injury. He testified that he was partially deaf; had been so for thirty years to the same extent. That he was in good health, and his deafness did not interfere with the pursuit of his business. That he did not use any mechanical applications to enable him to hear conversation, though a person speaking to him had to elevate his voice above the ordinary conversational tone to enable him to hear. That when he took out his insurance his deafness was just as it had been for years, and is now, and was at the time of his injury. In addressing the witness (plaintiff), judge and counsel had to raise their voices to a loud pitch to enable the witness to hear the questions. He could not hear questions asked in the tone used to other witnesses. That he was well acquainted with the local agent of defendant, who took his application and solicited his insurance, and had often conversed with him. That the said agent had a chance to know the extent of his deafness when he applied for the policy. That no question was asked about deafness, and nothing said about it when he made his application or received his policy. That he did not think of his deafness as a bodily infirmity, and did not intend to suppress the fact of his deafness as aforesaid. Plaintiff introduced and read the following letter from the secretary and general manager of defendant's company, having explained that the said letter was a reply to one written on September 10th by himself, under the assumed name of Samuel C. Moore:

"EXHIBIT A.

"The United States Mutual Accident Association, 820, 822 and 824 Broadway, New York.

"September 17, 1889. P. O. Box, 851.

"Samuel C. Moore, Esq., Asheville, N. C.

"Dear Sir: I have your favor of 10th instant, and in reply beg to say that, from the description you give of your deafness, we do not think that it will debar you from becoming a member of the Association. Fill out the inclosed application and forward it to us, together with your regular membership fee of $5.00, and on receipt we shall be pleased to issue a policy to you in this Association.

"Truly yours,

"James R. Pitcher,

"Secretary and General Manager."

J. J. Mackey, local agent of defendant, testified that he took plaintiff's application for membership in defendant company, and delivered him the policy. Plaintiff proposed to ask the witness if he knew the extent of plaintiff's deafness at the time of the application and of delivery of certificate or policy. This question was, under objection of defendant, excluded, and plaintiff excepted. Exception 1. Plaintiff then asked said witness if he had frequently conversed with plaintiff prior to said application, and if any questions were asked plaintiff by him, at time of application, about deafness, or plaintiff's attention drawn to it in any way. This question was excluded, and plaintiff excepted. Exception 2. Plaintiff proved by his wife that one Frank, adjuster of defendant, who came to see plaintiff after his injury and the amputation of his hand, said that the company was satisfied that no fraud or concealment was intended by plaintiff in not stating in his application that he was deaf. Defendant introduced the certificate or policy, and the application. His honor stated that he would instruct the jury that plaintiff was not entitled to recover anything upon the ground that plaintiff's deafness was a "bodily infirmity" which he had not disclosed in his reply to the questions printed in the application, and that this was so, notwithstanding such suppression was not fraudulent or intended, and though his deafness did not contribute to the injury. Exception 8. To this ruling and intimation plaintiff excepted, and, in deference thereto, submitted to a judgment of nonsuit and appealed to the supreme court.

The issues framed were as follows:

(1) Were the alleged receipt and acquittance obtained by the fraud or undue influence of plaintiff or its agent?

(2) Was the plaintiff, at the time of the execution of the alleged receipt and acquittance, incapable, by reason of his then mental condition, of understanding the meaning and effect of said paper writing?

(3) What is plaintiff entitled to recover from defendant on said policy?

Judgment: This cause coming on to be heard before me, in deference to the court, plaintiff submits to a judgment of nonsuit, and it is adjudged that the plaintiff take nothing by his suit, and the defendant go without day, etc.

Section 12 of the application was as follows: "(12) I have never had, or am I subject to, fits, disorders of the brain, rheumatism, or any bodily or mental infirmity, except as herein stated. Had an attack of rheumatism six years ago."

Two of the conditions of the policy were as follows: "(5) The application for membership, together with the classification risks indorsed thereon, are made a part of this certificate. Fraud or concealment in obtaining membership, or attempts by like means to obtain indemnity, shall make the membership and this insurance absolutely void. The Association may cancel this insurance and membership at any time by refunding the insured (member) herein named the membership fee, together with any balance to his credit deposited for assessments in advance. This membership and insurance, unless sooner terminated by forfeiture, cancellation or resignation, shall cease and determine when the insured (member) reaches the age of sixty-five years."

"(10) The provisions and conditions aforesaid, and a strict compliance therewith during the continuance of this certificate and insurance, are conditions precedent to the issuing of this certificate and to its validity, and no waiver shall be claimed by reason of the act of any agent, unless such act or waiver shall be specially authorized in writing over the signature of the secretary of this Association."

Messrs. W. W. Fuller, F. L. Fuller and R. B. Boone, for appellant:

In making and forwarding application, the insurance company is held to do all that the agent does and to know all that he knows, and is estopped from availing itself, of the act or omission of its agent.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It was competent to prove by the agent of the defendant, on cross-examination, that he knew, or had had abundant opportunity and good reason to know, the extent of the plaintiff's deafness, when he solicited him to take out a policy or subsequently and before the application was signed. Actual knowledge of the plaintiff's defective hearing on the part of the agent was constructive notice of it to his principal, and hence the latter is deemed to have waived the objection that the deafness of the former was a bodily infirmity, notwithstanding the fact that it was provided in the policy that the agents of the company should have no power to waive its conditions. Hornthal v. Western Ins. Co. 88 N. C. 73; Dupree v. Virginia Home Ins. Co. 93 N. C. 240, 92 N. C. 422; Collins v. Farmville Ins. & Bkg. Co. 79 N. C. 284; Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, 80 U. An application for insurance constitutes a part of the contract between the insurer and the insured, and the representations contained in it are presumptively inducements to the former to enter into it. But when it appears that an agent, through whom a corporation acts, himself examined and valued, or had opportunity to estimate by examination actually made by him, the value of property insured against fire, or frequently conversed with a man partially deaf, had opportunity to test the extent of his infirmity, and afterwards solicited or forwarded, with favorable recommendation, his application for insurance against accident, the insured will not be absolutely precluded from showing the facts, as evidence that the corporation assented to what subsequently appeared to be an overvaluation in the one case, or had knowledge of the defective hearing, and waived objection to the risk on account of it in the other. It was material that the jury, in passing upon and finding the facts upon which the liability of the defendant depended, should hear any testimony that would aid them in determining whether the defendant company was induced, or might reasonably have been induced, by the false representation contained in the application, to enter into the contract, when it would not have done so had its agents had full knowledge of the facts. The representation in the application must be, in contemplation of law, falsely and fraudulently made, in order to prevent a recovery in case of loss; but in the absence of any proof of knowledge of the misrepresentation complained of, or waiver of objection on account of it by the agents of the insured, a false statement constituting an apparent inducement to the contract will be deemed to have been made with fraudulent intent. Mace v. Provident L. Ins. Assn. 101 N. C. 183.

The courts of this country have differed widely as to the admissibility of testimony in cases like that before us. Some have held that parol testimony was not competent in a case to show a waiver of the requirements in the conditions of a policy or of the warranty arising out of the application; while others have limited the power of agents to waive its requirements in the face of a prohibitory provision in the policy, to matters not constituting essential and material portions of the contract, such as the stipulations as to proof of loss. There is a very general concurrence of courses in the view that where the execution of a contract has been procured by the fraud of an agent of the insurer, it may be declared void upon showing the acts of the agent inducing its execution. This case is distinguishable from that of Bobbit v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co., 66 N. C. 70, in that in the latter the plaintiff not only made a false statement, which was an apparent inducement to the defendant to issue the policy, but failed to rebut the presumption of fraudulent purpose by showing any actual knowledge of the true value of the property on the part of the corporation acting through its agent. In Dupree v. Virginia Home Ins. Co., 93 N. C. 240, Chief Justice Smith, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It was certainly competent to show this source of information possessed by the agency firm, in regard to the property included in both policies, when they issued the last, as tending to rebut the charge that it was solely brought about by the fraudulent statements contained in the plaintiff's application." The evidence referred to tended to show that a sub-agent of a general insurance agent had, the year before, inspected the same property for another company for which the general agent was acting, and had issued a policy upon the valuation then declared just by the sub-agent, and the general agent had the next year sent the insured the policy sued on, which was issued in the name of another company, upon the property destroyed by fire, but based upon the same valuation. Under the principle laid down, it was equally competent and material to show that Mackey, the agent of the defendant company, knew and could have informed his principal that the plaintiff was partially deaf, and, from the very nature of the case, could have communicated the extent of the infirmity. Being presumably in possession of the information acquired by its agent, the company is not deemed to have been induced to take the risk by the representation in the application that the plaintiff was not subject to any "bodily infirmity."

The principles announced by this court in the cases already cited are supported by reason and sustained by authority. May, Ins. §§ 181, 182; 1 Phillips, Ins. § 904. In Hornthal v. Western Ins. Co., supra, the court says that the policy "was issued and delivered to the plaintiff, with actual knowledge on the part of the agent, and constructive knowledge of his principal, and must be deemed to have been done with the full assent to the proposed increase." See also Collins v. Farmville Ins. & Bkg. Co. 79 N. C. 279; Argall v. Old North State Ins. Co. 84 N. C. 355; Dupree v. Virginia Home Ins. Co. 93 N. C. 422, 423. "The powers of the agent are prima facie co-extensive with the business intrusted to his care, and will not be narrowed by the limitations not communicated to the person with whom he deals." Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 232, 20 L. ed. 617. So in the case of Outhbertson

v. North Carolina Home Ins. Co., 96 N. C. 480 (cited by the defendant), the insured made a false representation as to the title of the property destroyed by fire, and offered no testimony to trace any actual knowledge of the facts to the defendant, or to rebut the presumption of a fraudulent intent by a waiver. Justice Davis, in Mace v. Provident L. Ins. Assn., 101 N. C. 188, says: "A false statement made in the application, when the application constitutes a part of the contract, will render the policy void, and so will any representation of a material fact by which the company is misled, if falsely and fraudulently made." But where there is a waiver, as in the cases of Hornthal v. Western Ins. Co. and Dupree v. Virginia Home Ins. Co., supra, though the false statement be made in the application itself, it does not mislead, and cannot be considered an inducement to the contract.

There was error, for which a new trial must be granted.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the loss of certain of plaintiff's property while in defendant's possession for transportation. Affirmed.

Statement by Lord, J.:

This is an action brought by the plaintiff to recover from the defendant the sum of $1,401.25 on account of the alleged failure of the defendant to deliver to the plaintiff certain personal property, specifically enumerated in the complaint, and constituting the contents of seven trunks. The complaint alleges that at the time therein mentioned the plaintiff, together with his wife and several other persons, naming them, constituted the Oakes Comedy Company, an organization giving theatrical entertainments in the villages and cities situated on the line of the Company's road, and that on said day, or the night thereof, the plaintiff, as proprietor of said theatrical organization, had engaged and advertised his company to give an entertainment at Thompeon's Fall, Mont., and had started with said company of people and baggage, by the defendant's line of road, to said place from Hope, in Idaho; that prior to starting he applied to defendant's ticket agent at said Hope for transportation for himself and other persons aforesaid, and their trunks and contents, and other movable property necessary and proper to be used by them in the business in which they were engaged, and necessary and proper as their wearing apparel; that he informed said ticket agent that he desired transportation for said persons and property, and said agent informed that it would be necessary for plaintiff to buy five first-class tickets for the sum therein specified to secure such transportation; and that thereupon plaintiff purchased said tickets, and secured said transportation and carriage, etc., and delivered said property to its agents and servants, which was accepted and taken in their charge and care, and for which he received checks in addition to his said tickets; that it refused and failed to deliver, etc.; and through its own negligence said train was wrecked, and a large part of the property was destroyed by fire, etc. The answer of the defendant put in issue all the allegations of the complaint, or that it had any knowledge or information as to the contents of such trunks, or the value thereof, etc. Upon the trial, the jury, at the request of the defendant, were required to find special answers to the following questions: "First. What do you find to be the value of the baggage belonging to the plaintiff and his company which was lost in the wreck of the defendant's cars March 25th last, aside from the stage properties, costumes, musical instruments and theatrical property of the comedy company? Answer, $381.25. Second. What do you find to be the value of the stage properties, musical instruments, advertising matter, tickets, stage costumes, and stage paraphernalia destroyed in the wreck on the 25th of March last? Answer, $754.75." At the same time the jury found a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $1,186, being for the full value of all the property belonging to the plaintiff and his company which was lost in the wreck. The counsel for the defendant moved to set aside the general verdict because the same was inconsistent with the special findings found by the jury, and moved the court to render a judgment upon such special findings in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum of $881.25, which the court refused to do, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of $1,186.

Lord, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant does not deny liability for the loss or destruction of the personal baggage of the plaintiff and the members of his troupe, but it denies liability for property other than actual personal baggage. In determining the question presented by this record it is necessary to understand the nature and extent of the obligation which a carrier of passengers by rail assumes as respects the personal baggage of the passenger. That obligation requires it not only to carry the passenger, but also to carry a reasonable amount of his personal baggage. "The carriage of the baggage of the passenger," said Andrews, J., "under reasonable limitations as to amount, is the ordinary incident to the carriage of the passenger; and the duty arises on the part of the company to carry the baggage of the passenger as incident to the principal contract, without any specific agreement or separate compensation." Isaacson v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 94 N. Y. 278. As respects such baggage, a carrier of passengers is held to the same liability as a common carrier of goods. For its loss or destruction, save by the act of God or the public enemy, it must respond, though without fault on its part. To this extent it is an insurer, and is responsible for the carriage and safe delivery of such baggage, the same as goods intrusted to it as freight. But it is only to such articles as may be legally termed "baggage" that such liability attaches, no matter what may be the contents of the bag or trunk. As to what constitutes "baggage" in the legal sense, or "ordinary baggage," or "personal baggage," as commonly used in England, it has been found by the courts difficult, if not impossible, to define with accuracy within the meaning of the rule of the carrier's liability. "It is agreed on all hands," said Erle, Ch. J., "that it is impossible to draw any very well defined line as to what is and what is not necessary or ordinary baggage for a traveler. That which one traveler would consider indispensable would be deemed superfluous and unnecessary by another. But the general habits and wants of mankind must be taken to be in the mind of the carrier when he receives a passenger for conveyance." Phelps v. London & N. W. R. Co. 19 C. B. N. S. 321. In a general sense it may be said to include such articles as it is usual for persons traveling to take with them for their pleasure, convenience and comfort, according to the habits and wants of the class to which they belong. In Weeks v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 9 Hun, 669, it is said that a passenger may carry with
